Since 1970 the cost of graduate and undergraduate degrees has tripled, and student financial assistance has declined by 10 percent during the same period. The lack of support in the area of graduate and undergraduate student aid during the Reagan administration has been particularly disturbing. While a bipartisan consensus in Congress has worked to fund student aid at levels higher than those proposed by the administration, the signs of trouble are clear: Student indebtedness and student loan default rates are both rising far too rapidly. This situation was not helped by tax changes in 1986 which eliminated the deduction for interest payments on educational loans and the exclusion of scholarships from taxable income.

Today's students face a burden of debt that will discourage them from pursuing public service careers. We must carefully consider how we will attract young people to lower paying but vitally needed professions such as teaching in light of these discouraging costs.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the time has come to amend the Tax Code to restore these important educational incentives. On behalf of my distinguished colleague, MARTIN LANCASTER, and the 17 other original cosponsors of this legislation, I urge my colleagues to join us in taking this small step to ensure that all Americans will have the opportunity to pursue a higher education.

TRIBUTE BY THE DEMOCRATIC MEMBERS OF THE NEW JERSEY CONGRESSIONAL DELEGATION TO MAYOR DENNIS COLLINS OF BAYONNE, NJ, FOR HIS OUTSTANDING PUBLIC SERVICE TO THE PEOPLE OF BAYONNE AND THE STATE OF NEW JERSEY

HON. ROBERT A. ROE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 4, 1989

Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, as dean of the New Jersey Congressional delegation, it is with the greatest pride and admiration that I rise on behalf of the Democratic Members of the delegation: Hon. JAMES J. FLORIO, Hon. WILLIAM J. HUGHES, Hon. FRANK J. GUARINI, Hon. BERNARD J. DWYER, Hon. ROBERT G. TORRICELLI, Hon. FRANK PALLONE, Jr., and Hon. DONALD M. PAYNE of New Jersey, on this opening day of the 101st Congress to pay our highest tribute to an outstanding leader and human being whose work in our home State of New Jersey has gained him national recognition.

I am speaking of the Honorable Dennis Collins, who in 1989 is celebrating 15 years as the deeply respected and admired mayor of the thriving city of Bayonne, NJ, and who has held that esteemed position longer than any other individual in the modern history of Bayonne. For all of his outstanding efforts in guiding Bayonne to its present status as a progressive city and truly model urban community, and for his multitude of contributions to his city, State and Nation, Mayor Collins will be honored by Members of Congress, State and national public officials, and numerous friends, colleagues, family members and constituents with a much-deserved testimonial tribute dinner on January 27 at the prestigious Hi-Hat Club in Bayonne.

Mr. Speaker, it is truly an honor for those of us who are Democratic Members of the New Jersey delegation to serve as sponsors of this memorable event. Dennis Collins has long been recognized as one of our Nation's most outstanding mayors, and Bayonne, under his guidance, has enjoyed a reputation as a unique and great American city. With its many varied peoples living and working together to help create a bustling and prosperous city, Bayonne is truly a microcosm of America itself, serving as a crossroads of the Eastern United States at the center of the great New Jersey-New York metropolitan area. Its great reputation even transcends our national borders, for it enjoys a sister-city relationship with its namesake across the Atlantic, the city of Bayonne, France.

Mr. Speaker, Mayor Collins attended Rutgers University and St. Peter's College and graduated from the Vale School of Real Estate and Insurance and the Professional School of Business. He is a licensed real estate broker in New Jersey. His public service to the community of Bayonne began more than 25 years ago when Dennis Collins was elected as a first ward councilman. His outstanding efforts as first ward councilman led, 4 years later, to his election as councilman-at-large and city council president.

For 8 years he worked tirelessly for the people of Bayonne, improving his city and the lives of those living in it. In 1974, recognizing the love and dedication Dennis Collins possessed for his great city, the people of Bayonne elected him mayor, a position he has held ever since. More than any words I or any of my colleagues could utter about Dennis Collins, Mr. Speaker, the prosperity enjoyed by the people of Bayonne truly serves as the ultimate testament as to the job Mayor Collins has done during his distinguished tenure.

Along with his direct involvement in his local government, Dennis Collins has served the people of Bayonne and New Jersey in countless other ways. He served as a legislative assistant to the New Jersey State Assembly and as assistant secretary of the New Jersey Insurance Commission. He also lent his efforts to the many outstanding initiatives of our truly distinguished late colleague, the Honorable Congressman Dominick V. Daniels, serving as his legislative assistant from 1972 to 1974. Along with his numerous governmental and professional activities, Mayor Collins is deeply involved in community activities, serving as standard bearer of the New Frontier Democrats, and as a member of the Knights of Columbus and American Legion Post 19 of Bayonne. In addition, he and his wife, Mary, are parishioners of Our Lady Star of the Sea R.C. Church.

Mr. Speaker, I know that the testimonial dinner in honor of Mayor Dennis Collins will bring great pride to Mary, to their children, Edward, Dennis, and Mrs. Mary Jane Stanul, and to their three grandchildren. Those of us in the House that know and admire Dennis Collins are also proud to count such an outstanding man among our friends. Truly, Mayor Dennis Collins, through his tireless and dedicated efforts at making his city a better place to live, has immeasurably improved not only his own city, but has made an enormous contribution to his State and our Nation as well. In recognition of those great efforts, Mr. Speaker, I invite you and our colleagues to join me in paying tribute to an outstanding leader, family man, human being, and public servant, the Honorable Dennis Collins, mayor of Bayonne, NJ.

OPENING OF THE BICENTENNIAL CONGRESS

HON. LINDY (MRS. HALE) BOGGS

OF LOUISIANA

Wednesday, January 4, 1989

Mrs. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, the opening of the 101st Congress on January 3, 1989, marks the beginning of the celebration of the 200th anniversary of the U.S. House of Representatives. The First Congress convened in New York City on March 4, 1789, and began the work of implementing the plan of government outlined in the Constitution. This bicentennial Congress offers the opportunity to commemorate the work of the first Federal Legislature and to remember the significant role played by the House of Representatives throughout the past 200 years. In the coming months a series of historical publications, exhibits, and conferences will contribute to a broader understanding of the importance of the First Congress and the history of the legislative branch of the Federal Government. Among the highlights of the bicentennial observances will be a joint meeting of Congress on March 2 in commemoration of the convening of the original Congress and a special session of the House of Representatives on April 4 to mark the anniversary of the first quorum of the House.

In honor of the 200th anniversary of Congress, the Office for the Bicentennial, in conjunction with the Senate Historical Office, has prepared a new edition of the "Biographical Directory of the United States Congress 1774–1989." The first revision of this valuable reference work since 1971, the new volume contains biographies of the more than 11,000 individuals to serve in Congress in the 1st through the 100th Congresses and all delegates to the Continental Congress. The Office for the Bicentennial also has published "A Guide to Research Collections of Former Members of the United States House of Representatives 1789–1987." This reference work lists the location of manuscript collections and other research materials pertaining to approximately 3,300 former Members. The "Biographical Directory" and the "Guide" will together serve as a resource and incentive for further research on the history of the House of Representatives.

On the occasion of the joint meeting of Congress the Office for the Bicentennial will publish a collection of documents relating to the origins of the House of Representatives and the proceedings of the First Congress. During February, as part of the annual observance of Black History Month, the Office will issue a revised and updated version of "Black Americans in Congress," first published in 1976. A new edition of "Women in Congress" will follow in June 1989.

Beginning in late January, an exhibit entitled "The Splendid Hall" will illustrate the history of the House from 1807 to 1857 when it met in the Chamber that now serves as Statuary Hall. An exhibit in the rotunda of the Cannon Building will include a wide selection of U.S. postage stamps that portray the Congress, the Capitol, and individuals who served in the House or Senate.

On February 9 and 10, historians, political scientists, journalists, and former and current Members of Congress will gather for a conference devoted to "understanding Congress." Five topical panels will examine such issues as Congress and the separation of powers, the effects of media and public opinion on Congress, the challenge of writing congressional biography, and the research opportunities found in the diverse sources for congressional history.

These publications and activities sponsored by the House Office for the Bicentennial will coincide with a variety of other events related to the bicentennial Congress. The National Portrait Gallery of the Smithsonian Institution will present an exhibit on the First Federal Congress. The Library of Congress will mount an exhibit of maps that illustrate the political party affiliation of each congressional district in the more than 30,000 House elections held since 1788. The National Archives will open an exhibit entitled "American Voices: Two-hundred Years of Speaking Out" that will include petitions presented to Congress and the other branches of Government. The Archives also will publish the "Guide to Records of the U.S. House of Representatives at the National Archives" and the "Guide to Records of the U.S. Senate at the National Archives."

A 90-minute documentary film, "The Congress," will air nationwide over PBS stations on March 20, 1989. The film was produced by the award-winning film maker Ken Burns with funding from Ameritech. It was produced in cooperation with WETA Public Television in Washington, DC.

The events and publications planned to coincide with the bicentennial Congress will provide the public with a better understanding of the importance of the First Congress in inaugurating the new Government under the U.S. Constitution. The delegates to the Federal Convention in the summer of 1787 reserved for the first Congress much of the responsibility for devising the structure of government. In the early months of its first session, the Congress counted the electoral votes for President, created the executive departments of the Cabinet, created the Supreme Court and the Federal judiciary, and answered the call for constitutional amendment by passing and sending the Bill of Rights to the States for ratification. In the following session, Congress provided for a permanent seat of Government along the banks of the Potomac.

In addition to completing the plan for governmental institutions, the First Congress took up the authorities delegated by the Constitution and provided for a national revenue, devised a plan for repayment of the debt, regulated the commerce of the young Republic, established the Bank of the United States, created a national census, and carried out a variety of other responsibilities denied to the National Government under the Articles of Confederation. The bicentennial of Congress provides an opportunity to examine the unique achievements of the First Congress and to develop a better perspective on the history of the House of Representatives, what the founders called the "first branch of the legislature."

For more information on events during the bicentennial Congress, contact the Office for the Bicentennial, 138 Cannon HOB, Washington, DC 20515–6701. (202) 225–1153.

LEGISLATION TO PRORATE SOCIAL SECURITY BENEFITS IN MONTH OF DEATH

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 4, 1989

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to call attention to what I believe is a grievous injustice perpetrated on our constituents by Social Security law.

Under current law, when a Social Security recipient passes away in any given month, his or her full monthly benefit must be returned to the Social Security Administration without regard to the date of death or to their expenses incurred during that period. Just think: One of your constituents could die at 11:59 p.m. on the last day of the month and still be required to return that month's Social Security benefit. It just doesn't seem fair.

Common sense ought to tell us there's a more equitable way of dealing with a Social Security recipient who incurs expenses in the month of death. And believe it or not there is—my legislation to prorate Social Security benefits in the month of death. Under my bill a Social Security recipient who passes away would receive a prorated benefit calculated by dividing the number of days that person was alive by the number of days in the month. For example, a person who dies on January 20 would receive 20/31 of their monthly Social Security benefit.

It's simple; it's fair; and it ought to be law. I would ask all my colleagues to cosponsor this legislation and help change this inequity.

PROVIDING EQUAL RELIEF FOR RELIGIOUS SCHOOLS

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 4, 1989

Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill that would correct a gross injustice of our Tax Code.

Under the Federal Unemployment Tax Act, States are given the opportunity to establish certain requirements in order to grant certain individuals and entities credit against Federal Unemployment Tax. Currently, all 50 States have established these minimum requirements.

Emerging from this legislative guagmire is a situation which is of specific concern to me. Elementary and secondary schools which are under the direction of a church and/or a separate corporation, formed by a church or an association of churches, are given this tax credit. However, elementary and secondary schools which are of religious nature, but are not affiliated with an organized church, do not receive the credit.

Why these schools are discriminated against totally perplexes me. They perform the same duties as affiliated religious schools and teach the doctrine of an organized church. Moreover, they are considered to be too religious to receive a nutrition education funding grant from the Department of Agriculture, but not religious enough to be exempted from State unemployment tax.

My bill would finally rectify this inequality in our Tax Code. All elementary and secondary religious schools, affiliated or independent, would be guaranteed the benefit of this tax credit. It is that simple.

I urge my colleagues to join me in my efforts to bring fairness back into the U.S. Tax Code. Taxation and discrimination of religious institutions is clearly unconstitutional. Let us join together and restore credibility to our beleaguered tax system.

ON REAGAN ADMINISTRATION WHISTLEBLOWER PROTECTION PLAN

HON. PATRICIA SCHROEDER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 4, 1989

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, late yesterday we heard the last distant quacking of a very lame duck President. Two months after pocket vetoing S. 508, strong whistleblower protection legislation, President Reagan submitted to Congress an anemic proposal entitled "whistleblower protection." President Reagan's transmittal came, coincidentally, on the same day that Representative FRANK HORTON and I introduced H.R. 25, the Whistleblower Protection Act of 1988, which is identical to the bill which President Reagan vetoed last October.

Congress supports strong whistleblower protection because it is a powerful weapon to reduce the deficit. Federal workers are the ones who best know where fraud, waste, and abuse are to be found in Government programs. They know about the Pentagon contractor ripoffs; they know about the safety dangers of the shuttle; they know about defects in the air traffic control system. But, Federal workers are not likely to disclose what they know unless they believe they will be protected in their jobs. You cannot expect someone to heroically disclose waste if it means unemployment.

The Reagan proposal has two central failures. First, the reason the current whistleblower protection system has failed is because the Merit Systems Protection Board and the courts have construed the burden of proof for whistleblowers in such a way that is virtually impossible for the whistleblower to win. S. 508 and H.R. 25 correct this by legislating that the whistleblower must prove that the disclosure was a factor in the personnel action. An agency can then show by clear and convincing evidence that it would have taken the same action in the absence of the disclosure. The administration proposal retains the current, untenable burden of proof. So, the administration proposal provides no improved protection for whistleblowers.

Second, the Office of Special Counsel was established in 1979 to provide protection to Federal employees who were victims of prohibited personnnel practices, including reprisals for whistleblowing. This Office has, sadly, lost sight of its mission. Instead of protecting employees from agency reprisals, the Office of Special Counsel frequently has worked with agency management to harm employees who come to the Special Counsel for help. So, in S. 508 and H.R. 25, we added provisions making it impossible for the Special Counsel to act to the detriment of an employee who seeks the help of that Office. The administration proposal excises these protections.

President Reagan now says he wants strong whistleblower protection legislation. If this is true, he should have signed S. 508. Fortunately, what President Reagan thinks is now irrelevant. Two weeks from tomorrow, he will be another southern California retiree.

What is far more important is what GEORGE BUSH thinks. We will be moving H.R. 25 to House consideration in the near future. If the Bush administration wants to propose changes in H.R. 25, they know where to reach us.

OUTSTANDING SERVICE

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 4, 1989

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, Members of the House, it's my privilege to offer commendations on behalf of the House of Representatives and the people of the 19th Congressional District of California to Joe Centano, who stepped down from his position as chief of police of Santa Maria, CA, on December 31.

Joe has been an outstanding public servant and civic leader. During his 32 years of service to the city, he rose from the rank of patrol officer to chief of police, coming up through the ranks. A native Santa Marian, he is a graduate of Santa Maria High School, Allan Hancock College, and La Verne College. He received his B.A. in criminology and behavioral science and earned a master's degree in public administration from Golden Gate University. And as part of his retirement plans, Joe plans to keep his hand in the profession by finishing his doctoral dissertation at Golden Gate.

During his long tenure on the police force, Chief Centano served on numerous civic and professional boards and commissions, including the PRIDE Program, United Way, and the Countywide Task Force on Juvenile Justice, a field of particular interest to him. In 1983, he was named Outstanding National Police Chief by the We-Tip Program.

Joe and his wife, Sylvia, have contributed countless hours to the people of Santa Maria, as well as two children. It's my honor to extend the congratulations of the U.S. Congress and the grateful thanks of the people of the United States to Chief Joe Centano and his family for their generous service and devotion to duty.

WHY DID THE UNITED STATES RESTORE AID TO HAITI?

HON. MAJOR R. OWENS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 4, 1989

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, shortly before the holiday recess, the Reagan administration renewed economic aid to Haiti, giving it $25 million and promising another $5 million in the not too distant future. The administration had cut off aid to Haiti in November, 1987, following the massacres of hundreds to Haitian voters by the military and elements of the terrorist organization the Tonton Macoutes during that country's national elections. The administration has said that it would not restore the aid until Haiti held free and fair elections for a civilian government, respected the human rights of the island's people, and made other significant moves toward democracy.

In renewing the aid, the administration claims to be encouraged by the new military government in Haiti headed by General Prosper Avril, who took power in a bloodless coup last October. But I see little in this newest ruling military junta that justifies such encouragement. Yes, the General purged some 57 key officers known for their brutality and corruption; however, as Haitian opposition leader Louis Dejoie told the Christian Science Monitor, most of the purged officials were small fry, and those with links to the Tonton Macoutes remained in their positions.

Yes, General Avril says he supports free and fair elections for a democratic, civilian government—but in 2½ years. He claims that the Haitian people aren't ready for such elections, a claim disproven in November, 1987 when Haitians literally risked their lives to go to the polls and vote for a President, a Vice President, a Congress and local officials.

And just last Saturday, the Avril government permitted former Port-of-Prince Major Franck Romain to leave Haiti on a safe conduct pass and flee into exile. Romain, who was also a reputed leader in the Tonton Macoute, was under investigation in Haiti for reportedly directing a massacre last September 11 at a Catholic church, in which 12 people were killed and 70 injured. Opposition activities in Haiti correctly point out that the government's allowing Romain his freedom seriously jeopardizes the investigation, and represents a major setback in human rights for Haiti's people.

The administration should have learned its lesson about Haitian dictatorships and their superficial changes a year ago, when the military governments of Henri Namphy and the militarily-controlled civilian government of Leslie Manigat also proclaimed to support democracy and human rights while in reality the Haitian people continued to be victimized and brutalized by solidiers and elements of the Tonton Macoute.

The United States policy toward Haiti must not yield to such cosmetic changes or be an informal, ad hoc policy to go soft on Haiti. It must be based on reality. The administration should report to the Congress as to the current conditions in Haiti, and it should also monitor and report on how and if Haiti is making use of our aid, as the Avril government claimed that it could not go forward with various reforms unless it obtained the aid.

Only full-scale democracy will rescue Haiti from the years of poverty and ignorance which have dominated the island. Only the United Statess refusal to accept surface reforms as the real thing will help bring about fundamental change.

TRIBUTE TO MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR.

HON. CONSTANCE A. MORELLA

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 4, 1989

Mrs. MORELLA. Mr. Speaker, January 15, 1989 will mark the 60th anniversary of the birth of the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., and I would like to take a moment to pay tribute to this historic leader of the civil rights movement.

Dr. King was a determined and righteous man who inspired faith and hope in millions of his followers and supporters who shared his dream of equal justice under the law for all peoples, regardless of race, creed, or color. From the time of the Montgomery bus boycott, when Dr. King first came to national attention, to Selma, AL, to the March on Washington, Dr. King was a powerful spokesman for underprivileged Americans—in fact, all Americans—who had not been afforded the full rights and protections guaranteed them in the Constitution.

But Dr. King is remembered as a great man not solely because of his effort to bring full constitutional rights, but especially because he was able to accomplish his goals by the practice of nonviolent protest, which he had learned from his study of the Indian leader, Mahatma Gandhi, and the American writer and naturalist, Henry David Thoreau. Dr. King's successful use of this principle set the stage for a revival of grassroots democracy in the United States, beginning with successful efforts to end the Vietnam war and continuing with other issues today. The popular participation engendered by the nonviolent movements serves to strengthen our democratic system of government.

Dr. King had a dream that there would come a day when all men would judge each other by the content of their character rather than the color of their skin, when all men would look upon others as brothers. The progress which has been made since the March on Washington toward achieving Dr. King's dream has been nothing short of remarkable; equally daunting is the work which remains to fulfill the dream, not only nationally, but also on an international basis.

Mr. Speaker, I urge all Members to use the occasion of the 60th anniversary of Dr. King's birth, as I will, to reflect on how we can help to fulfill his dream, and ours.

LEGISLATION TO EXTEND THE TARGETED JOBS TAX CREDIT TO CERTAIN, QUALIFIED ELDERLY EMPLOYEES

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 4, 1989

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, today I am reintroducing a bill that would allow employers to claim the targeted jobs tax credit [TJTC] for a new group of employees. My bill will expand the current definition of eligible targeted groups to include certain, qualified elderly persons. I intend to continue my efforts on behalf of those elderly who are seeking employment, yet are unable to find employers interested in incurring expenses related to hiring, retraining, and otherwise facilitating elderly workers.

Currently, there are 10 groups of employees for which an employer may claim the TJTC, including economically disadvantaged youths, vocational rehabilitation referrals, and supplemental income recipients. This bill would expand the TJTC to include employees who: Have attained the age of 55 before date of hire; earn no more than $20,000 in gross income during any taxable year which the employer files for the tax credit; and receive no wages subsidized under the Older American Community Service Employment Act during any taxable year in which the employer files for the tax credit.

The legislation also includes rules that prohibit employers from abusing the intent of this bill.

By encouraging employers to hire the elderly, this bill would be mutually beneficial to businesses in need of workers, and to many of our Nation's elderly, who are ready and willing to get out and work. I believe there are many businesses that would use the tax credit to offset expenses incurred in hiring elderly workers. It is my hope that this bill will receive the support it deserves, and that it will be signed by the President during the 101st Congress.

REPEAL ESTATE, GIFT, AND GENERATION SKIPPING TRANSFER TAXES

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 4, 1989

Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, today, I introduced legislation which would repeal the current law for taxation of estates, gifts, and generation skipping transfers. I am introducing this bill in order to eliminate an egregious form of double taxation and bring about more simplicity in the Tax Code.

These three taxes are forms of double taxation because both the original funds and the transfers of money are taxed. Individuals pay taxes when wealth is created, that is, when compensation in the form of wages or salaries is received there is an individual income tax. When interest is received from savings there is a tax on interest income. When an individual makes money from the sale of an asset there is a capital gains tax. When an individual receives a dividend from an investment in stock that dividend is taxed. Estate, gift and generation-skipping transfer taxes, instead of taxing the creation of wealth, tax the transfer of this already taxed money. If we are to bring greater fairness to the Tax Code, a dollar should only be taxed once: when it is earned.

The generation-skipping transfer tax provisions are so complex that only a small number of estate planning specialists can profess to have any understanding of them. In addition, the complexity creates serious compliance problems and even competent counsel, as well as professional trustees often encounter extreme difficulty in ascertaining whether or not a taxable event that would trigger a generation-skipping transfer tax has occurred. In addition, once an event is identified, there is much difficulty in establishing the correct tax on the occurrence. Simple elimination of the generation-skipping transfer tax will do much in moving toward the goal of simplicity while losing only a marginal amount of revenue, since the revenues lost from the elimination of all three taxes would account for a reduction of only about 1 percent of Federal revenues from individual income taxes.

The retention of the estate, gift and generation-skipping transfer taxes is but one area where tax reform failed. I urge my colleagues to carefully consider this bill. Money should only be taxed once: when earned. Once an individual earns this money, he should be free to do whatever he wants to do with his money without penalty. If an individual wants to use those already taxed dollars as a gift, to set up a trust for his descendants, or to build an estate which will safeguard the financial security of his or her inheritors, the Federal Government should not interfere by levying a tax on this type of transfer.

ENTERPRISE ZONE IMPROVEMENT ACT OF 1989

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 4, 1989

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, today Congressman RANGEL and I have introduced legislation to strengthen title VII of the 1987 Housing Act—the Federal Enterprise Zone Program. This legislation, the Enterprise Zone Improvement Act of 1989, will provide businesses with the necessary incentives to locate or expand in specially designated urban and rural areas.

Under title VII, Congress authorized the Department of Housing and Urban Development to designate up to 100 enterprise zones from sites nominated by State and local governments. In order to be eligible for the Federal program, applications must show evidence of local commitment to the nominated area, including a reduction of property taxes or development fees, an increase in the level of public services, simplification of paperwork requirements, minority contracting preferences, provision of land, and community involvement.

Today, 36 States have established enterprise zone programs and have already made their own designations. These areas will also be eligible for Federal designation. With a full set of incentives and support from the Federal, State, and local levels, these areas will become zones of renewal and revitalization.

The Enterprise Zone Improvement Act will provide special tax incentives to encourage business activity within these enterprise zones. These include tax credits to employers for employment related expenses and to employees for qualified wages received. The act encourages investment by offering a tax credit for the cost of enterpise zone construction property and nonrecognition of capital gains when the proceeds are reinvested in replacement property.

The act also encourages business capitalization by allowing investor tax benefits for the purchase of stock issued by enterpise zone businesses. Rules relating to limitations on property financed with tax-exempt industrial development bonds are amended to allow funding for residential rental property and enterpise zone construction property. Tax credits for research are increased from 25 to 27½ percent for research conducted in enterpise zones.

The act also requires every Federal agency that administers a program applicable to enterpise zones to provide special assistance, including expedited processing, priority funding, program set-asides, and technical assistance. This provision is important to assure that eligible public and private activity receives adequate Federal support and to provide the Federal commitment necessary to meet the objectives of the enterpise zone program.

This legislation represents many years of hard work. Former Congressman Jack Kemp and myself originally introduced in 1980, and in each Congress after 1980, legislation that accomplishes these same objectives. The general thrust of the legislation has remained the same. Federal commitment to designated enterprise zones is made through the enactment of special tax benefits for business-related activity and the provision of special Federal assistance applicable to enterpise zones.

I thank Speaker JIM WRIGHT for his support of this legislation today, and Chairman CHARLES RANGEL for his sponsorship and support. This legislation achieves the original objectives of the Kemp-Garcia legislation and represents a significant Federal commitment to blighted urban and rural areas. I urge my colleagues to support this measure.

LET'S LABEL PRODUCTS WITH CFC'S

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 4, 1989

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, the destruction of the ozone layer by chlorofluorocarbons [CFC's] and related chemicals has become an established fact. The discussion has turned to how best to reduce and eliminate CFC's.

While I am a strong supporter of the Montreal Protocol, I believe we can and must do more. The Montreal Protocol, and EPA's efforts to administer the phaseouts called for in the protocol, are a freeze on 1986 production levels and a 50-percent reduction in production of CFC's by 1998.

The public can and must be brought in to help reduce CFC use. Labeling is a sure and effective way to enlist this public support in the fight to save the ozone. Voting with dollars, I believe the public will quickly turn to alternative products that do not use CFC's. The public wants to participate in the process.

In order to help consumers, I am today introducing legislation, with Congressman GEORGE BROWN and Congressman BATES, which will label all products which contain, is produced with, or is produced from CFC's. Without this legislation, it will be difficult for the average consumer to make an informed choice.

The choices are out there. Refrigerators are currently being developed that use helium instead of CFC's as a coolant. A consumer can choose to buy paper coffee cups instead of those made using CFC's. This bill will also provide manufacturers with an additional incentive to develop and market products that do not use CFC's.

We label cereal and cigarettes. We put warnings on stepladders and cribs. Literally, with CFC's the fate of the world is at stake. People should have the right to know what they are buying. I believe industry and the new administration would be surprised at the swiftness with which the marketplace will call for alternatives to CFC's.

THE PROPOSED PAY RAISE

HON. PETER J. VISCLOSKY

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 4, 1989

Mr. VISCLOSKY. Mr. Speaker, the Federal deficit is currently $155.1 billion. Congress' first priority must be to erase this deficit and restore our Nation's fiscal stability. In order to achieve this, every American will be called upon to assume their fair share of the burden. Therefore, I must register my opposition to the Commission on Executive, Legislative, and Judicial Salaries' recent recommendation for a 50-percent salary increase for Federal judges, Cabinet Secretaries, top-level executive branch officials and Members of Congress. The recommendation was made to President Reagan and it is my hope that he will reject it.

If this raise were to go into effect, it would mean that each Member of Congress would receive an increase of $45,000. Multiplied by 535, the number of Senators and Representatives, this totals almost $24 million more that must be squeezed from the Federal budget. What kind of example are we setting when we ask our constituents to accept less in Federal services and programs?

Furthermore, like much of the Midwest, the region I represent has not fared well economically in the past 8 years. While there has been some recovery, too many citizens of northwest Indiana are still struggling. A salary increase of this magnitude is clearly ill-timed and sends the wrong message to those who elected us.

I do want to commend the Commission for recommending a ban on honorariums. I endorse efforts to reform the amounts and types of outside earned income that Members of Congress can presently accept. Those of us who choose to enter public service should not do so based on financial compensation.

A BILL TO REAUTHORIZE THE COMMODITY FUTURES TRADING COMMISSION

HON. E de la GARZA

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 4, 1989

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to reauthorize, for 5 years, appropriations to carry out the Commodity Futures Regulatory Program under the Commodity Exchange Act. The act is administered by the Commodity Futures Trading Commission [CFTC], an independent regulatory agency established by Congress in 1974. I am pleased that Hon. EDWARD R. MADIGAN, the ranking Republican member of the Committee on Agriculture, Hon. GLENN ENGLISH, and Hon. E. THOMAS COLEMAN have agreed to cosponsor this important legislation.

It is my impression that the CFTC has done a responsible job in carrying out the act since it was last reauthorized in 1986. In recent years, the CFTC has worked with the futures industry to regulate the markets through a period of unprecedented growth. Notably, this period included the market break during October 1987, when the Dow Jones industrial average fell over 500 points in 1 day. The CFTC's performance during those difficult times acts as evidence that the agency has matured into an effective independent regulatory agency.

It is my intent that this bill will serve as a legislative vehicle for the consideration of the reauthorization of the CFTC. At this time, I am satisfied that a wholesale revision of the Commodity Exchange Act is not warranted. However, I would like to assure America's farmers, cattle producers, financial market participants, members of the futures industry, financial market regulators, and my colleagues in Congress that the Committee on Agriculture will carefully review the soundness of the Futures Regulatory Program, the effectiveness of the CFTC, and the performance of the futures markets during this year's reauthorization hearings. If these hearings indicate that some fine tuning of the act is necessary, I would encourage the committee to amend the act accordingly.

I am aware that the CFTC has under consideration several technical amendments to the act that they soon may commend to Congress for our consideration. I would like to assure all parties concerned that the Committee on Agriculture will carefully consider these technical amendments to the act when they are received.

Finally, and perhaps most importantly, the introduction of this bill so early in the 101st Congress is meant to act as an indication of my resolve, as chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, to carry out the committee's responsibilities in connection with this legislation as expeditiously and as diligently as possible. The integrity of our agricultural and financial markets demands no less.

THE DEAF TAXPAYER ASSISTANCE ACT

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 4, 1989

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to once again introduce the legislation to provide deaf individuals with an increased standard deduction of $600.

This legislation, the Deaf Taxpayer Assistance Act of 1989, is intended to put the deaf on an equal footing as the elderly and the blind. As many of you will recall, the Tax Reform Act of 1986 eliminated the additional exemption for the elderly and the blind. Instead, however, those individuals were allowed to take an increased standard deduction of $600. The Deaf Taxpayer Assistance Act merely provides an identical increase for deaf taxpayers, a deaf spouse, or a deaf dependent.

Under the bill, an individual is considered deaf if his or her ability to hear is so seriously impaired that the individual receives spoken language through means such as lip reading, sign language, finger spelling, or reading. By introducing this legislation, it is my hope that more attention will be focused on the deaf and the difficulties that they face: Increased medical expenses, increased personal expenses, and the increased effort necessary to live in a world of sound.

Mr. Speaker, as a long time advocate for our Nation's hearing impaired, I believe this legislation represents an important first step in realizing the difficulty deaf individuals face in our society. I encourage my colleagues to cosponsor the Deaf Taxpayer Assistance Act of 1989.

DEFICIT REDUCTION

HON. JACK BUECHNER

OF MISSOURI

Wednesday, January 4, 1989

Mr. BUECHNER. Mr. Speaker, GEORGE BUSH has said repeatedly that those who support a tax increase should "read my lips." The response of most congressional leaders proves that very few can lip read. The collective chant heard over and over again in Washington is "tax increase, tax increase, tax increase." How many times have we heard the Washington pundits and media experts say the only way to lower the Federal deficit is to increase taxes?

Through all of the lip reading and political positioning, the taxpayer has the right to ask, "Will a tax increase decrease the deficit?" The answer is, "Of course not!" We all know that any tax increase is not going to be used to decrease the budget deficit. Instead, Congress will use any additional revenue to increase spending and will run the deficit right up to the maximum allowed by Gramm-Rudman.

Today, Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation which will commit the Federal Government to meaningful deficit reduction, and make those who support increasing taxes as a means of reducing the deficit to put their money where their mouth is. My legislation would amend the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act by requiring a dollar-for-dollar decrease in the Gramm-Rudman deficit targets for every dollar of tax increase. For example, if taxes are increased by $20 billion for fiscal year 1990, the Gramm-Rudman deficit target for fiscal year 1990 would be lowered from $100 to $80 billion.

I want to make it clear that I do not support increasing taxes as a means of reducing the budget deficit. The deficit problem is the result of Congress not being able to set spending priorities, or display any spending restraint. My legislation will separate those who are interested in further increasing Federal spending from those who are truly interested in deficit reduction. Please join me in sponsoring a bill which would guarantee that the American public's tax dollars are used to decrease the deficit, and not support further Federal spending.

THE ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF MR. TERRY HAWS

HON. RONALD V. DELLUMS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 4, 1989

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, it is with great admiration that I call my colleagues' attention to the considerable accomplishments of Mr. Terry Haws of my congressional district.

Mr. Haws, who has been actively involved in causes for individuals with mental retardation, has been on the Las Trampas School board of directors for 30 years. He was instrumental in founding the school, which has residences and programs for persons with mental retardation. It was through his efforts that the Las Trampas School established its first group home, the Moraga House, which was followed by two more group homes, allowing Las Trampas residents to live in community settings.

Terry Haws, who is president of the Haws Drinking Faucet Co., also designed the first drinking fountains which were wheelchair accessible.

As a parent of a child with mental retardation, Mr. Haws' philosophy has included not only helping his child, but improving the lives of other children with mental retardation, and has devoted his life to doing just that.

It is with profound respect and admiration that I share with my colleagues the accomplishments of this dedicated and committed constituent, Mr. Terry Haws, on the occasion of his retirement from the board of directors of the Las Trampas School.

THE INTRODUCTION OF THE DEFENSE PRODUCTION ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1988

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 4, 1989

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, the House Subcommittee on Economic Stabilization—which I have the honor of chairing—has conducted an extensive series of hearings on current problems facing the U.S. industrial base and whether it can supply critical materials in times of national emergency. These hearings were held in conjunction with the subcommittee's jurisdiction over the Defense Production Act of 1950.

To perhaps the surprise of no one, an array of witnesses from business, labor, public organizations, and an Under Secretary of Defense concluded that the U.S. industrial base is eroding and that actions must be taken to reverse its deterioration and restore U.S. industrial strength. This jeopardizes our national security.

Specifically, the subcommittee hearings revealed that the U.S. industrial base is developing a strong dependency on foreign sources for products, parts and components, and other materials used in manufacturing and that such a dependence, especially in times of national emergency, would weaken our national defense. Moreover, the inability of U.S. industry, especially small- and medium-sized subcontractors and suppliers, to provide vital parts and components and other materials would prevent the United States from meeting production surge demands should a national emergency arise. Additionally, the U.S. industrial base is being eroded by a growing dependence on imported parts, components, and raw materials. Clearly, this is a serious threat to our national defense.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a partisan issue; it affects all of us equally. Today, I am introducing legislation designed to get us started in that direction.

I ask that my entire statement be submitted for the record and that an explanation of the legislation follow my remarks.

Mr. Speaker, within the text of this much needed legislation, I amend the Defense Production Act of 1950 to include a national plan for the economic conversion of defense plants and military bases to civilian production. In light of the recent military base closing recommendations and anticipated cuts within the Pentagon's budget, thousands of Americans will be forced to look elsewhere for employment.

Mr. Speaker, while my subcommittee earlier addressed the importance of this country's defense industrial base, I believe we must not overlook the economies of hundreds of American cities heavily dependent upon the flow of Pentagon funding. In short, defense spending has been the primary generator of federally induced jobs in our economy. I propose a national economic conversion plan because as the number of large weapons contracts fall, comprehensive plans must be drawn to facilitate transition from defense dependency to productive civilian alternatives.

Minidepressions in heavily dependent defense communities are not unique. Economic upheavals that many communities are facing can be avoided with proper planning. The grave economic conditions that may occur in pockets of California, Massachusetts, or New York may indeed be alleviated if we craft alternatives to look beyond defense dependency. While civilian production creates items of value for consumers and producers, military production does not. Mr. Speaker, in order to make a smooth transition, I believe this country needs to address and set in motion a planning process which promotes long-term econoomic vitality and security. I believe my national economic conversion plan does just that!

A REVIEW OF THE CRISIS IN EL SALVADOR

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

Wednesday, January 4, 1989

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I submit the final two parts of an informative five-part series about the crisis in El Salvador, as published in the Christian Science Monitor this month.

I included the first three parts in the RECORD on the day we adjourned, October 21. I am doing so with the hope of encouraging a critical review of what is happening in that country in the wake of the Reagan administration's disastrous policy of the past 8 years.

I again urge my colleagues to take the opportunity to read the report, as follows:

THE POLITICS OF POLARIZATION

(By Brook Larmer)

SAN SALVADOR.—Just as the new mayor, Armando Calderón Sol, launches into a tirade about corruption and inefficiency in the government of José Napoleón Duarte, he is cut off by an urgent phone call from the chief of police.

Mr. Calderón Sol—a front-line warrior in the battle to reform the nefarious image of the right-wing Nationalist Republican Alliance (ARENA)—returns with startling news: The police just caught two of his employees selling promises of government jobs for $100 to $200 each.

"There's a crisis of values in every government institution," says Calderón Sol, echoing the theme that, in March, helped him sweep past incumbent mayor Alejandro Duarte, the President's son. "We're trying to create a totally new image. And if we don't do something about corruption, we're not going anywhere."

It's quite a twist on history.

Ever since ARENA was founded by former Army intelligence officer Roberto d'Aubuisson in 1981, it has been known more for chasing down "communists" than corruption.

Mr. d'Aubuisson himself has been charged with leading right-wing death squads that bloodied the streets with up to 25 bodies a day in the early 1980s. US officials accused d'Aubuisson of arranging a machine-gun attack on the American Embassy here in 1981 and linked his associates to a plot to assassinate then-Ambassador Thomas Pickering in 1984.

The controversial ex-Army major is still the party's driving force, according to several diplomats who closely monitor ARENA. But he has lowered his profile since his 1984 election defeat, allowing the more moderate voices of Calderón Sol and presidential candidate Alfredo Cristiani to woo middle-class voters and US policymakers.

The strategy has apparently worked.

ARENA overwhelmed the US-backed Christian Democrats in the March 1988 elections, winning 179 of the country's 262 towns and a majority of deputies in the 60-seat Legislative Assembly. And now, as it promotes reputation for clean, effective government, the far-right party seems poised to wrest the presidency from Duarte's party in elections next March.

The US administration has portrayed ARENA's election victory as another step for a maturing democracy. Assistant Secretary of State Elliot Abrams says: "I can't think of a better test than having a government in power run totally free elections and allow itself to lose them."

SETBACK FOR US POLICY

But a wide range of foreign diplomats and political analysts here—including ARENA leaders themselves—consider the party's rise to be a stinging rejection of an American policy that has staked its hopes on Duarte's moderate Christian Democrats.

Even US officials concede that if d'Aubuisson played a key role in an ARENA presidency, Washington would have to re-evaluate its deep commitment to El Salvador.

Since 1980, the United States has spent more than $3 billion propping up the political middle so that extremists on the right and left would not take power. The Central Intelligence Agency even pumped in several million dollars to ensure Duarte's 1984 election win over d'Aubuisson.

Duarte has notched some successes. Despite the country's current power vacuum and economic woes, the military has not responded with an old-style coup. The leftist rebels are finding it difficult to stir up social unrest. And even Duarte's leftist critics say more Salvadorans now respect the vote as the most effective method for change.

But even with massive US aid—and in part because of the exaggerated expectations it generated—Duarte has lost popular support. Indeed, pollsters here say the March elections were less a popular embrace of ARENA than an angry rejection of the Christian Democrats for failing to produce either prosperity or peace.

VOTERS DISILLUSIONED

For proof, the pollsters point to the fastest-growing group in the electorate: people who don't vote at all. More than 1.4 million voters cast ballots in the 1984 elections that catapulted Duarte into office; only 930,000 people voted in last March's legislative elections.

Like a negligent farmer, critics say, Duarte has failed to cultivate his government. He chose ineffective administrators. He let the misuse of US funds run rampant. And he failed to prevent a damaging internal split from eating away at his party.

But there were also enormous roadblocks. With his lofty goals of peace and reform, Duarte felt trapped between left and right. According to a close friend, his feelings urged him to address the needs of the popular working classes; but his reason told him to cater to the powerful—the Army, the oligarchy, and the US Embassy.

"Duarte created, in theory, a centrist government of reform and change, but he's just clung onto office," says a European diplomat, voicing the frustration of many Salvadorans. "In the face of monumental challenges, he's retreated into the world of illusion. He has come to represent not reform but the status quo."

LEFT JOINS POLITICAL PROCESS

Several leftist politicians have returned after years of exile to try to capture the huge pool of disillusioned voters. They formed a small coalition, the Democratic Convergence—including the political ally of the guerrillas, the Democratic Revolutionary Front—to participate in the 1989 elections. But the leftist leaders have not renounced their ties to the rebels (see accompanying story).

The Christian Democrats' presidential candidate is a former planning minister, Fidel Chávez Meña. With heavy US backing, the colorless technocrat recently won a bitter power struggle with his freewheeling party rival, Adolfo Rey Prendes.

But most political observers say Mr. Chávez Meña piled up a lot of political debts along the way.

"His hands are completely tied," says leftist leader Jorge Villacorta, noting that the candidate owes his biggest debt to the US Embassy. "Chávez Meña is much more compromised with the US than Duarte ever was." he says. "He'd make a good employee."

ARENA'S "MODERATE" MAN

Chávez Meña's opponent in ARENA, businessman Alfredo Cristiani, is also a bit short on clout and charisma. As one European diplomat quipped: "Freddy is very pleasant, very moderate, very mediocre—he'd make a good diplomat."

Mr. Cristiani, a Georgetown University graduate, has impressed US policymakers with his soft-spoken manner and perfect English. The wealthy coffee grower says he wants to roll back Duarte's liberal reforms by returning the banks and export trade to private hands. But he also assails the US for bogging down the war effort with its "human rights psychosis."

Cristiani has attracted middle-class voters looking for a respectable alternative to the Christian Democrats. But critics say his policies would dangerously polarize the country, widening the gap between left and right, rich and poor.

"The only serious chance for stability is if Chávez Meña wins," a top Reagan administration official says. "If Salvadorans want to continue European and North American support, they need Chávez Meña there."

But several other US officials and Cristiani himself seem confident that as long as ARENA maintains a moderate image, the US won't slash badly needed economic and military aid. "If we win a free election," Cristiani says, "the US has no choice but to work with us."

With ARENA running ahead in the polls, US officials here are scurrying around trying to help tame the party. But some officials say they still have a lingering fear that the inexperienced Cristiani will not be able to control ARENA's darker side. There are unsettling signs that Cristiani is not in charge.

Retired Col. Sigifredo Ochoa, ARENA's president of the Legislative Assembly, recently raised new concerns when he warned that any US attempt to impose Chávez Meña as president would be met with "right-wing guerrillas."

At the ARENA party convention Oct. 9, it was d'Aubuisson who wielded influence behind the scenes. According to a party official and a well-informed diplomat, his supporters pressured Calderón Sol, the moderate mayor, to decline the vice-presidential nomination, leaving it open for a close d'Aubuisson ally.

It's not clear how the US would react to an ARENA victory. But just as Duarte's 1984 victory over d'Aubuisson removed El Salvador as a contentious US issue, so ARENA's rise is sure to put the country back on the American political map.

EL SALVADOR'S POLITICAL LEFT IS A STUDY IN CONTRASTS

SAN SALVADOR.—Rubén Zamora seems to thrive on contradictions.

On one hand, he is a driving force behind the Democratic Convergence, a coalition of leftist parties participating in the democratic process for the first time in 16 years. But on the other hand, the European-style Socialist keeps an alliance with the Marxist rebels of the Farabundo Martí Liberation Front.

One of the Convergence's priorities in the campaign for next March's presidential elections is to push for political negotiations, including the FMLN, to bring an end to the eight-year civil war. But statements by the rebels indicate they may yet try to sabotage the elections.

Mr. Zamora and Guillermo Ungo, the left's presidential candidate, returned from eight years of exile last year against the wishes of the FMLN to take advantage of the Central American peace plan and the political void left by the faltering Christian Democrats.

Organizing in rural areas in a bid to build a nationwide party, Zamora says they have found two sentiments among potential supporters: fear, given the thousands of political killings in the past eight years, and hope. "Our task is to make hope predominate over fear."

The leftist leaders admit that their continuing connection to the armed rebels has somewhat undermined their campaign.

Not only has it irked the United States Embassy and the Salvadorian government; it has also scared and confused some potential supporters. In several recent protest marches, more radical groups tied to the FMLN—prone to violence and provocation—have mixed with peaceful demonstrators. This has only "given the Army an instrument to generate terror" against all leftist supporters, one leader says.

The Army is not now engaged in the murders of leftist politicians, as it was in the early '80s. But the Army and government are carrying out an extensive psychological campaign to blame the Convergence for the destruction the FMLN wrought.

At a recent gathering of journalists, President Duarte asked: "How are they going to justify their links with the FMLN"? How are they going to explain it?"

Zamora says it is simple. "The FMLN is an indispensable part of the political solution in this country. It would be a political absurdity to return to fight politically and break relations [with the FMLN]."

At this point in El Salvador, he suggests, elections alone will not resolve the country's problems, since no matter who wins, the real power rests in the hands of the Army. Zamora says political negotiations involving the Army and rebels are needed along with elections.

Also, by severing ties with the FMLN, a force rooted in the country's economic and political injustices, leftist politicians fear they would be reduced to a "bonsai left"—a decorative part of Salvadorian democracy continually pruned by intimidation.

For now, the Convergence is only shooting to finish third in the presidential race. That way, one of their members, most likely Zamora, would be appointed to a five-year seat on the three-member elections council—and play a key brokering role in running the country's future elections.—B.L.

HARD LESSONS FOR THE UNITED STATES AND THE REGION

(By Brook Larmer)

SAN SALVADOR.—El Salvador's forgotten war is coming back to haunt Washington.

After four years in the shadow of Nicaragua, this tiny United States ally is poised to become one of the stickiest foreign-policy issues to confront the next US administration, diplomats, Salvadoran analysts, and US officials say.

The increasingly polarized situation here—marked by the rise of hard-line conservatives, an intensifying war, and rising human rights abuses—will likely force the US to reevaluate both its huge commitment to El Salvador and the direction of US policy in Central America, US and Salvadoran officials say.

Since 1980, the US has quietly poured more than $1 million a day into El Salvador. The money has had two objectives: to defeat the Marxist rebels and to build a democratic political center that would fend off extremists on the left and right. Neither has been fulfilled. Further, the progress made toward both is in danger.

"One of the first things the new president could face is a collapse of US policy in El Salvador", predicts a senior US Democratic aide with long experience on issues in the region. "The administration continues to frame El Salvador as a success story. But we're just sitting around waiting for disaster to happen."

With $3.3 billion in total US aid since 1980, El Salvador has been able to prevent the kind of communist takeover that toppled neighboring Nicaragua in 1979. While turning up the heat on the region's hottest war, it has also cobbled together a fragile democracy, a modest economic upturn, and a more professional, restrained military.

But now, the US "project" is spinning slowly out of control.

The interminable eight-year war is heating up. Death-squad murders have doubled this year. The government has failed to remedy the wretched poverty that helps fuel the conflict. And the political center has disintegrated, opening the way for the likely victory of a party with a notoriously anti-democratic past in March's presidential elections.

"The country is becoming so polarized that all the old worries of 1980 are coming back," says a Western diplomat, referring to the period when the political extremes plunged El Salvador into war. "The similarities are eerie."

So far, only a few in Washington have shown concern about the dark clouds gathering in El Salvador. But the stormy conditions could have profound implications for both the region and US policy, according to a wide range of diplomats, Salvadoran political analysts, and past and present US officials.

These sources clash over what future US policy in El Salvador should be, but they largely agree on what will emerge as the most prickly issues:

Reining in the new leaders. Leadership posts in both the Army and civilian government are soon expected to be handed over to representatives of more aggressive factions with past links to death squads.

The US virtually handpicked President José Napoleón Duarte and the Army high command in 1983 and 1984. But it will have less control over new conservative leaders, who openly blame the "gringos" for bogging down the war effort. US support for such a government is likely to be far more contentious than backing the centrist Duarte government.

A costly but endless war. The US has spent eight years and $850 million building a professional 57,000-man Army to defeat the 6,000 to 8,000 Marxist guerrillas. The war effort has helped prevent a rebel victory. But after 65,000 deaths, even optimistic US officials say the killing could easily go on for years. Congress will undoubtedly find it increasingly hard to muster the political will to sustain a seemingly endless war.

Roots of revolution. The Reagan administration has portrayed the insurgency as a classic case of Soviet-Cuban expansion. Obsessed with the external threat, it gave short shrift to the internal roots of the revolutionary movement: poverty and injustice. As a result, the US has backed away from Duarte's reforms and distrusted the idea of negotiations. Many Salvadoran analysts doubt the war can ever be won if the lot of the poor is not improved. But to seriously attack social inequities will require a reorientation of US policy.

High costs for the region. As long as the Salvadoran war continues, its two fragile neighbors, Guatemala and Honduras, will be affected by fleeing refugees, fighting on their borders, and the continued militarization of the region. Central America, sapped by large, nonproductive armies and continuing turmoil, is already mired in its worst economic crisis of the century. Stoking the region's hottest war will make it nearly impossible for these nations—both of which inaugurated civilian leaders in 1986 after decades of miltary rule—to consolidate either genuine democracy or economic prosperity.

Keeping Nicaragua in line. Despite the mounting concerns over the direction of events in Salvador, many policymakers say it must not be abandoned, because it plays an ever-more vital role as the region's main buffer against communism. This is so because just a few hundred miles south Nicaragua is consolidating its communist state after the de facto defeat of the US-backed contras.

US officials and Salvadoran Army officers fear that Managua may soon be freer to aid the Salvadoran rebels more directly. It will be up to the next US administration to reconcile the disturbing developments in El Salvador with the perceived need to support its government.

Inching toward talks. With no military victory in sight, many diplomats and left-leaning politicians here think the US should now push for a lasting negotiated solution. But the obstacles are formidable in this deeply polarized country, where the two armies have not budged from their rock-hard positions.

Another obstacle—perhaps the biggest—has been the US Embassy. Duarte negotiated with the rebels three times—against the US's will. According to diplomats and a senior Salvadoran official, the US encouraged him to drop the talks.

As in Nicaragua, the US policy in El Salvador has emphasized military victory, not negotiation. In his last speech before leaving in August, outgoing Ambassador Edwin Corr advised Salvadorans not to let "impatience" result in negotiated concessions with the Marxist rebels.

The US says it supports dialogue, but only within the framework of the Salvadoran Constitution. Under such rules, the rebels would have to put down their arms before negotiating, something they consider tantamount to surrender.

Ironically, the US pushes for exactly the opposite in Nicaragua, where it sides with the antigovernment contra forces.

Little room to maneuver. Even with the many troubling signs in El Salvador, policymakers are at a loss for a clear alternative to current US policy. A drastic cut or a boost in aid would add fuel to Salvador's hard-line extremists. Most analysts say the next US administration will have to navigate cautiously through this funding dilemma, avoiding major cuts but trying to use aid more effectively as leverage for change.

Most experienced political analysts here say an increase in aid would send a misguided message of encouragement to the hard-liners likely to come in power. It would also feed El Salvador's debilitating dependence.

"Clearly, just pouring more money down there doesn't help. We've turned them into junkies," a Democratic aide says.

Overdependence has become a burden on the donor, the US, as well as the receiver, El Salvador. The US cannot fund this war indefinitely. And it will never have long-term success if El Salvador remains a weak client state that is every day more dependent on US handouts.

Building an independent economy in the midst of war is no easy task. But a prominent economist here says El Salvador's intermediate goal should be to "diversify dependence." It should find other markets and money in Europe, he says.

The dangers of slashing aid are just as great. Even top Democratic advisers say a drastic cut in aid would throw away the US's only leverage for pressuring El Salvador on human rights, judicial proceedings, or even negotiations with the guerrillas. Lacking both funding and accountability, hard-line Army elements could get out of control.

"If the US pulls out, either El Salvador falls to the guerrillas or the Army goes the Guatemala route," says one US military analyst. The Guatemalan Army unleashed a terrifying campaign of murder against anyone with suspected leftist ties in the late 1970s, soon after the US cut off aid because of continuing human-rights violations.

Most diplomats and military analysts here say the Salvadoran Army would show more restraint than the right-wing politicians pushing to wipe out the guerrillas quickly. But despite its professed devotion to democracy, the powerful Army is so used to ruling that no one expects it to take a back-row seat in the future.

As four US colonels wrote in a report last spring: "The United States can hardly just walk away from El Salvador without some concern about the Army's role in Salvadoran politics."

Congress is just beginning to stir on the issue of El Salvador. Last spring, it withheld $5 million in US military aid because the Duarte government made no progress investigating the murders of two US labor advisers by government security forces.

Congress recently approved an amendment to the 1989 foreign-aid bill that shifted 25 percent of El Salvador's economic support funds away from war-related activities to address basic human needs.

While small, these cases foreshadow a future in which Congress wields its influence without drastically reducing aid.

"This is the first real change in how the administration distributes aid since Duarte's election," says Caleb Rossiter of the Arms Control and Foreign Policy Caucus. "It's just the beginning."

TRAUMA CARE SYSTEMS PLANNING AND DEVELOPMENT ACT OF 1989

HON. JIM BATES

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 4, 1989

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Trauma Care Systems Planning and Development Act of 1989. This legislation passed in the House of Representatives in the 100th session of Congress but was not considered by the Senate due to time constraints.

This bill will save 20,000 lives per year by providing assistance to States. The legislation authorizes $45 million per year in each of the next 3 years to encourage States to develop, implement, and monitor the trauma care component of each State's emergency medical services.

Each year, 20,000 to 25,000 people in the United States die from their injuries in hospitals unnecessarily. That is 20,000 to 25,000 deaths each year that could have been prevented if organized trauma systems were in place across the United States the way they are in West Germany. Trauma, severe accidental injury, kills 140,000 people in the United States each year, and another 80,000 become permanently disabled from a brain or spinal cord injury. Trauma is the leading cause of death for Americans up to age 34 and that is one of the reasons that one out of every eight hospital beds is occupied by an injured patient. While trauma is primarily a disease of the young, it is far more fatal in older victims. Fully 30,000 of the 140,000 people who die each year from injuries in the United States are over age 65. Studies show that those over age 65 have a 90-percent greater chance of dying from injury than those under age 65 regardless of the severity of the injury.

Those who live in the few areas of the country that have insitituted organized systems of trauma care are the luckly ones. Fully 80 percent of the U.S. population does not live in an area that is part of an organized system of trauma care. A victim injured in an area located near a developed trauma center will have a chance of survival nearly double that of a victim injured near traditional medical centers. In the vast majority of the country, injured victims are simply taken to the nearest hospital. That is why 20,000 to 25,000 people in the United States die from their injuries in hospitals unnecessarily.

Transportation difficulties, long response time for personnel, and the lack of trauma systems, are reasons why we have such a high injury and death rate from trauma in rural areas. This legislation requires participating states to identify rural areas which have no access to emergency medical services through the 911 emergency telepone number.

The economic costs of trauma in addition to the human costs to our Nation are enormous. The national safety council estimates that each year, trauma costs the Nation $135 billion through lost wages, medical expenses, insurance administration costs, and property damage. Injuries from motor vehicles alone—only one-third of all accidental injuries—costs us more every year than any other disease except cancer.

We have a crises in trauma care in this country. In the past 3 years, 8 of Los Angeles County's 24 designated trauma centers have closed, leaving the region's trauma network near collapse. Yet trauma can largely be prevented. Organized systems of trauma care—which involve prompt identification of serious injury, prompt transfer of an injured person to a specialized trauma facility—save lives. This has been strikingly demonstrated in my own district. In San Diego County, CA, we instituted a trauma system 4 years ago. A recent study in San Diego showed that the trauma death rate fell by 55 percent after the implementation of a trauma care system.

This bill has been drafted with the unanimous consent of the medical community. The American College of Surgeons, the American College of Emergency Physicians, the American Medical Association, the American Association of Retired Persons, and the National Association of EMS Physicians are some of the groups that support the enactment of this legislation.

The human costs of trauma to our Nation—in the form of grief over the loss of a loved one—cannot be measured. The economic costs, as noted, are staggering. The cost of my bill is very modest in relation to the actual costs savings that will be accrued, particularly in view of the major public health problem that it addresses.

This measure will go a long way toward reducing the needless loss of lives, and I urge my colleagues to support it. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Following is the text of the bill:

H.R.—

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Trauma Care Systems Planning and Development Act of 1989".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.

The Congress finds that—

(1) the Federal Government and the governments of the States have established a history of cooperation in the development, implementation, and monitoring of integrated, comprehensive systems for the provision of emergency medical services throughout the United States;

(2) physical trauma is the leading cause of death of Americans between the ages of 1 and 44 and is the third leading cause of death in the general population of the United States;

(3) physical trauma in the United States results in an aggregate annual cost of $135,000,000,000 in medical expenses, insurance, administrative costs, property damage, and indirect costs (including more than an annual $31,000,000,000 in lost wages of individuals who are in their most productive work years); and

(4) the number of incidents of physical trauma in the United States is a serious medical and social problem, and the number of deaths resulting from such incidents can be substantially reduced by improving the trauma-care components of the systems for the provision of emergency medical services in the United States.

DR. MARTIN LUTHER KING'S MESSAGE

(Mr. MAZZOLI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, this past Monday the United States of America for the fourth time commemorated the birthday of Martin Luther King, Jr., with a national holiday, and millions of words in the form of speeches and written material have ensued, and there is a tendency in all of that emotion to perhaps make Dr. King into something which he was not, and that is into a perfect person, and of course no human being is perfect. A human being cannot be perfect.

But, Mr. Speaker, Dr. King did touch a wellspring in the American people, and I think that the essence and the genuineness of Dr. King was captured in the remarks made by Vice President BUSH, President-elect Bush, 2 days ago, and that is that Dr. King wanted to improve the lot, not just of black people and poor people, but improve the lot of all people in the United States and across the world, and to that end he gave his life.

Mr. Speaker, that is a beautiful message. It is a very powerful message, and it is a message which all of us would do well to emulate. We all need to contribute to make the world and this Nation better.

THE INAUGURATION—A RECONFIRMATION OF OUR LEADERSHIP IN THE WORLD

(Mr. GEKAS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, Members of the House, 200 years ago, in January 1789, the Nation was preparing, as we are today, for the inauguration of the first President of the United States. Albeit that did not occur until April of that year, the entire Nation was in the hubbub of the expectancy and excitement that preceded the convening of the First Congress of the United States and the inauguration of the first President.

Two hundred years later we can actually say that everybody in the United States marvels at the fact that the transition that is about to occur from the Reagan administration to the new President of the United States 200 years after that first President came to power is one of easy transition, smoothness, and one of historic significance confirming once again that the Constitution of the United States and the society of the United States are unparalleled in world history and will continue to represent the leadership in the world in all phases of life.

HOW COULD THIS HAPPEN?

(Mr. LEHMAN of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. LEHMAN of California. Mr. Speaker, 2 days ago an indigent and obviously deranged man walked into a school yard in Stockton, CA, a community in my district, pulled out a Chinese AK–47, an automatic rifle, and murdered at least five young, innocent elementary school students. He wounded 30 others, and he traumatized an entire community which now grieves over a loss that cannot be replaced. He purchased this dangerous lethal weapon, that can only be used to kill people, over the counter from a vendor in Oregon.

Mr. Speaker, how could this happen? Why was a weapon like this for sale over the counter in the first place? How could a deranged indigent come to own one? Why was there not some minimal waiting period required to check into this person's mental stability or his reasons for wanting a lethal automatic weapon in the first place? At least there should have been some impediment for preventing this act to make it less likely that further ones could occur.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a question of legitimate constitutional rights. Deranged people have no rights to own automatic rifles, and society has an obligation to put reasonable restrictions in place. All over the counter sales of AK–47's and weapons of destruction like them should be banned. Real gun enthusiasts do not need them. Mass murderers do.

SOMETHING WRONG WITH GUN CONTROL

(Mr. CRAIG asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, the recent tragedy in Stockton, CA, where a deranged criminal brutally murdered several innocent schoolchildren, has already prompted calls for more restrictions on firearms.

Some who are advocating new gun laws aimed at semiautomatic rifles are well-meaning and sincere, but ignorant of the fact that the semiautomatic action is the same in a Remington Model Four 30–06 as in the weapon used in that recent tragic crime.

Others, who make their living advocating restrictive gun laws, are more cynical in their efforts to restrict or ban semiautomatics. Let me quote from a recent pamphlet, published by the disingenuously named "Educational Fund to End Handgun Violence."

Among reasons cited by the authors for the prospective success of bans on semiautomatics are that "it will be a new topic in what has become to the press and public an 'old' debate." The authors continue to laud the potential of this new agenda item:

> The weapons' meanacing looks, coupled with the public's confusion over fully automatic machine guns versus semiautomatic assault weapons—anything that looks like a machine gun is assumed to be a machine gun—can only increase that chance of public support for restrictions on these weapons.

And that is what we have been seeing, Mr. Speaker, widespread confusion over the facts of the incident, the background of the criminal, and the firearms used. Most of this confusion is attributable to an ill-informed yet opinionated mass media. I have even heard one radio personality state that "what makes the AK–47 so deadly is its automatic magazine." To anyone who knows anything about firearms, that is of course ludicrous.

Mr. Speaker, we will again be asked to consider legislation that would restrict the access by law-abiding citizens to a particular type of firearm because of the actions of a homicidal maniac. As my colleagues are aware, this individual was armed with not only a rifle, but with a pistol as well. A pistol, I might add, that the criminal purchased in California, under her 15-day waiting period and police background check. It frankly astonishes me to hear some of my colleagues state that a police background check would have prevented this criminal from acquiring a rifle when it so clearly did not prevent him from acquiring, legally, a handgun.

Yet the calls for "gun control" continue. I have yet to hear calls for the responsible approach to this problem. We understand from news reports that the perpetrator of the Stockton crime had a lengthy criminal arrest record. What has gone unreported is what happened to those arrests. Here was an individual charged with narcotics offenses, weapons offenses, and the crime of robbery. All of those offenses can be classified as felonies. Yet this man was not in prison! If these serious charges were repeatedly plea bargained down to misdemeanors, a fact that would allow him to comply with the waiting period system in California and purchase his pistol, then the American people deserve to hear from the prosecutor and the judge who put this individual back on the streets. If not, then there is something seriously wrong with records retrieval and storage system employed by the State of California.

I for one am proud, Mr. Speaker, that this body had the foresight to act on precisely this issue in the 100th Congress. Last Congress, you will remember, we instructed the Justice Department to investigate the adequacy of the current system for storage and retrieval of criminal records. The Justice Department will be reporting back to this body this fall, with a detailed plan setting out improvements in those records, and the availability of technology to allow the instantaneous access to those records at the point of sale of a firearm, whether rifle or handgun.

Most importantly, however, as part of the same amendment to the omnibus antidrug bill, we mandated the revocation of probation for any felon caught in possession of a firearm. It is too soon to tell whether such a mandate would have kept Patrick Purdy in jail, but this new law may well prevent similar tragedies from occurring in the future.

INTRODUCTION OF RESOLUTION TO OPPOSE USE OF GASOLINE TAXES FOR DEFICIT REDUCTION

(Mr. ANDERSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, today more than 60 cosponsors, including the bipartisan leadership of the Committee on Public Works and Transportation, join me in introducing a sense of the House resolution strongly opposing the use of Federal gasoline and diesel taxes for deficit reduction. When used for transportation purposes, these taxes are sensible user fees; however, when used to reduce the deficit, motorfuels taxes are harshly regressive, geographically inequitable, and damaging to our economy.

Moderate- and low-income groups in this country would suffer the most under such a deficit reduction scheme. The lowest income gasoline users would pay more than three times as much for deficit reduction relative to their income as more affluent citizens. Surely we cannot justify basing a contribution to deficit reduction on the amount of gasoline an individual uses. Also, Americans in rural communities, on a per household basis, travel 40 percent more miles a day. These rural citizens should not pay 40 percent more at the gasoline pump for deficit reduction than Americans living in metropolitan areas, especially since rural communities often cannot provide their residents a mass transit alternative.

The American economy would also suffer greatly from an increase in gasoline and diesel taxes for deficit reduction. A recent Wharton econometric study forecasts a $10-billion drop in the gross national product from a 10-cent-per-gallon increase. The recessionary impact of such an increase would force 80,000 persons out of work in the first year, and 180,000 by the third. Furthermore, automobile production, housing construction and petroleum refinery output would all decline significantly, while inflation surged by 0.3 percent. A 10-cent increase would generate all of these negative impacts—imagine the economic damage that a larger increase, supported by some, would cause.

Mr. Speaker, the introduction of this resolution today will send a strong message to keep transportation user fees where they belong, and where they are badly needed—expanding and improving our transportation network.

BUDGET OF THE UNITED STATES, FISCAL YEAR 1990—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 101-3)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, and the accompanying message containing recommendations for executive, legislative and judicial salaries received on January 9, 1989, is also referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service and ordered printed as part 2 of that House Document.

THE BUDGET MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate:

Eight years ago many in this country were concerned about the future of our economy, our government and, indeed, the Nation itself. Unemployment was high and rising. Inflation and interest rates were reaching record levels. Our Nation's defense capabilities had been weakened by neglect. The international prestige of the U.S. was at low ebb.

To resolve the economic problems then facing us, our administration proposed a recovery program centering on four fundamental principles:

—Reduce personal and business tax rates.
—Reduce the rate of growth of Federal spending.
—Reduce the Federal regulatory burden by eliminating unnecessary restrictions while protecting the public's interest and safety.
—Support a moderate and steady monetary policy to bring inflation under control.

To rebuild our defense capabilities and restore America's standing in the world we proposed expanded national security and international programs.

We also initiated the largest management improvement program ever attempted in order to restore the proper relationships among the Federal, State and local governments, and the private sector; to eliminate waste in Federal programs; and to introduce management controls and efficiencies, while improving services.

Today, the American people can be proud of the progress that has been made on each of these fronts. As a result of this progress, America is internally stronger, internationally more secure, and stands taller in the eyes of the world than it did eight years ago.

EIGHT YEARS OF ACCOMPLISHMENT

Working together, we have accomplished much over the last eight years.

THE ECONOMY

—The current economic expansion, now in its seventy-fourth month, has outlasted all previous peacetime expansions in U.S. history. Business investment and exports are rising, and economic growth is expected to continue into the 1990's.
—Since this expansion began, 19 million new jobs have been created, while the unemployment rate has fallen by more than 5 percentage points—to 5.4 percent, the lowest level in 14 years.
—Inflation, which averaged 10.4 percent annually during the four years before our administration began, has averaged less than a third of that during the past six years.
—Real after-tax personal income has risen 24 percent since 1982, increasing our overall standard of living.

TAXES AND REGULATIONS

—Between 1981 and 1987, changes in the Federal tax code have made the tax laws more equitable, cut income tax rates, and eliminated Federal income taxes for 4.3 million low-income individuals and families.
—Since 1981, the time spent by the public filling out forms required by the Federal Government has been cut by 600 million hours annually, and the number of pages of regulations published annually in the Federal Register has been reduced by over 45 percent.

BUDGET

—The growth in domestic spending has been slowed, and the budget priorities have been shifted to those functions the Federal Government should provide, such as national defense, basic scientific research, and protecting the rights of all citizens.

—The social security system has been rescued from the brink of insolvency and made sound into the next century.

—The runaway growth of spending for means-tested entitlement programs that occurred in the 1970's has been curbed. Eligibility rules have been tightened to retarget benefits to the needy. Basic benefits for the poor, the elderly, and others in need of Federal assistance have been maintained.

—We have begun the process of putting other entitlement programs on a more rational basis, including medicare hospital insurance, which was converted to a system that encourages efficiency and lower costs.

DEFENSE AND INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

—Our defenses have been strengthened. Weapons systems have been modernized and upgraded. We are recruiting and retaining higher caliber military personnel. The readiness, training, and morale of our troops have been improved significantly.

—As a result of our greater strength, we were able to negotiate with the Soviet Union a verifiable treaty that completely eliminates an entire class of nuclear missiles.

—We began the Strategic Defense Initiative research and technology program that offers our best hope of a safer world in which our security, and that of our allies, no longer rests on deterrence through the threat of nuclear retaliation, but on defenses that threaten no one.

—Our willingness to defend freedom throughout the world has met with success in the spread of democracy and in turning back the tide of Communist expansion.

MANAGEMENT OF THE GOVERNMENT

—Federal agencies undertook a major management improvement program, "Reform '88," to carry out the cash, credit, and financial operations of the Federal Government in a more business-like manner, and to reduce waste, fraud, and abuse.

—Functions that were pre-empted by the Federal Government are being transferred back to the private sector or to State and local governments.

—Greater use is being made of cost sharing and user fees, shifting the cost of projects and programs where appropriate to those who benefit from them.

THE FEDERAL DEFICIT

The one area in which I have been persistently disappointed throughout my term of office has been in the efforts to bring the budget under control. Time and again I have proposed measures to help curb Federal domestic program spending. Time and again these proposals have been rejected by Congress.

The reasons for the rise in the Federal deficit in the early 1980's are simple. First, we experienced one of the most severe recessions of the postwar period. It has been estimated that 81 percent—over $640 billion—of the growth of the deficit over the 1981–1986 levels originally projected in my March 1981 budget was attributable to that recession. The second reason is that, even after including necessary increases for defense, my March 1981 budget called for net spending reductions totaling $331 billion over 5 years; but Congress approved less than 40 percent of those reductions. Wasteful programs continued to be funded. The necessary reductions have still not been made.

If the deficit is not curbed by continuing to limit the appetite of government, we put in jeopardy all that we worked so hard over the years to achieve. Large deficits brought on by excessive domestic spending undercut the incentives to work and save by absorbing the savings that would otherwise lead to productive investment. We cannot allow this to happen.

I am proud of America's accomplishments. Our economy is booming, our defenses are stronger, and our standing in the world is again second to none.

THIS BUDGET REDUCES THE 1990 DEFICIT BELOW THE G-R-H TARGET AND ACHIEVES BALANCE IN 1993

The fiscal year 1990 budget, my last, represents a continuation of my efforts to reduce the Federal budget deficit through restraint in domestic spending.

The budget I am submitting today complies with the deficit targets set in the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings (G-R-H) Act, by proposing measures that meet the 1990 deficit target of $100 billion and assure a steady reduction in the deficit, leading to a balanced budget in 1993.

Under my proposals, the deficit would decline to less than 2 percent of GNP in 1990, and the Federal debt held by the public would also decline as a proportion of GNP.

This budget shows that a gradual elimination of the deficit is possible without raising taxes, without cutting into essential social programs, without devastating defense, and without neglecting other national priorities. It can be done in a reasonable, responsible way—with discipline and fairness. New taxes are not required. Receipts will grow dramatically between 1989 and 1990 because our economy is growing. This budget simply proposes to increase spending by less than the increase in revenues, and therefore, reduce the deficit. The proposed reforms will yield additional deficit reductions in future years. We have an opportunity this year to put the worst of the deficit problem behind us and enable the next Administration to begin its term of office with a clean slate and with the promise of continuing prosperity.

FUNDING NATIONAL PRIORITIES

To address urgent national priorities within the deficit limit set by the G-R-

H Act, my budget proposes that some programs—such as those for AIDS research and prevention, drug enforcement, and technology development—receive significant funding increases, while others are reduced, reformed, or, in some cases, terminated.

DEFENSE

Maintaining peace and protecting our country are the foremost responsibilities of the Federal government. Defense budget authority declined in real (inflation-adjusted) terms for the fourth straight year with funding of $299 billion for 1989. This trend cannot continue without severe impact on combat readiness. Therefore, my budget requests defense funding of $315 billion in budget authority and $303 billion in outlays for 1990, and $331 billion in budget authority and $314 billion in outlays in 1991. These amounts provide 2 percent annual real growth in budget authority over the 1989 level, bringing it back up to the 1984 level in inflation-adjusted terms by 1991. The budget also projects 2 percent real growth in these programs in future years.

We must continue to maintain our nuclear deterrent. For 1990, the budget proposes $9.0 billion for atomic energy defense programs, a $0.9 billion increase over 1989. A total of $2.8 billion is dedicated to the modernization of the nuclear materials production complex and to increase environmental clean-up and waste management efforts.

INTERNATIONAL

To consolidate and build on the foreign policy gains of the past eight years, additional funds are needed for international affairs that would promote our foreign policy and national security interests in the Middle East, Central America, and elsewhere. A special program is proposed to foster strong economic growth in the Philippines to support that country's return to democracy. Other increases in foreign aid would pay arrearages on contributions to multilateral lending institutions and make payments to the United Nations and related agencies.

DRUG ABUSE AND LAW ENFORCEMENT

Our fight against drug abuse must continue, as well as our efforts to protect the individual against crime:

—For drug law enforcement, prevention, and treatment programs, I propose $5.7 billion in 1990, an increase of $164 million over 1989. This funding, together with the new authorities and sanctions contained in the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988, will enable us to move toward our goal of a drug-free America.

—To relieve prison overcrowding and adequately house a growing inmate population, I would provide $1.6 billion for prison construction and operation, $193 million more than was devoted to this purpose in 1989.

AIDS RESEARCH AND EDUCATION

This budget reflects my belief that addressing the problem of AIDS must remain a top priority:

—Preventing and alleviating suffering from the Human Immunodeficiency Virus (HIV), which causes AIDS, is our highest public health priority. Federal support for research, prevention, and treatment exceeds $2.1 billion in 1989, and will approach $2.8 billion in 1990. This budget asks for $1.6 billion, or 24 percent over 1989, for Public Health Service HIV funding.

RESEARCH

One of our highest priorities is to strengthen U.S. technology and make America more competitive. For example:

—I propose a continued increase in federally supported basic research aimed at longer-term improvements in the Nation's productivity and global competitiveness. This budget continues the commitment to double National Science Foundation support for academic basic research by 1993, increases support for training future scientists and engineers, and expedites transfer of the results of Government-funded basic research to industry.

—Our space program will provide $13.1 billion for continued development of America's first permanently manned space station; for increased support for improving the performance and reliability of the space shuttle; for initiation of two major new international planetary space science missions; and for support to encourage the commercial development of space.

—Also included in the budget is $250 million in 1990 as the Federal share of support for initiating construction of the Superconducting Super Collider (SSC). Non-Federal cost sharing arrangements will be required to support one-third of the project's costs. The SSC as currently envisaged will be the largest pure science project ever undertaken. It will help keep this country on the cutting edge of high energy physics research well into the next century.

OTHER PRIORITIES

Other areas of Federal responsibility receive priority funding in this budget:

—To continue the Federal Aviation Administration's multi-year program to increase its controller and inspector workforces and to modernize the Nation's air traffic control systems, the budget provides $7.7 billion—a 17 percent increase over the 1989 level.

—To alleviate the problems facing our savings institutions, I propose that the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation (FSLIC) spend $16 billion in 1989 and $9 billion in 1990 to address the most serious thrift institution problems. The Secretary of the Treasury is developing a comprehensive plan to resolve the savings industry's problems, and reform the financial institution regulatory structure and deposit insurance system to prevent a reoccurrence of these problems. I expect the Secretary to submit his proposals to the new President shortly.

—To improve coordination of Federal rural development programs and to redirect funding toward needy rural areas and program recipients, I am continuing support of the rural development initiative coordinated by the Secretary of Agriculture.

—By emphasizing housing vouchers, I would provide housing assistance to 132,000 additional low-income households in 1990, 5 percent more than the 126,124 additional households receiving housing subsidies in 1989. Housing vouchers can serve more low-income households at a lower Federal cost and provide greater opportunity for these families to rent housing of their own choosing.

—To maintain the progress we have been making in fostering State and local education reform, I would sustain the present level of spending on discretionary education programs at $18.5 billion, but refocus those funds to put more money where the needs of the disadvantaged and students with handicaps are greatest.

—To continue the significant progress we have made in cleaning up the environment, I recommend a $105 million increase for the Environmental Protection Agency's regulatory, research and enforcement programs. I also recommend an increase of $315 million for the Superfund hazardous waste clean-up program in order to maintain the program's momentum and support a stronger enforcement role.

—Because changes in the earth's natural systems can have tremendous economic and social effects, global climate change is becoming a critical concern. Our ability to understand and predict these changes is currently limited, and a better understanding is essential for developing policies. The budget proposes a coordinated and effective Federal research program on global change. This budget is accompanied by a report by the Committee on Earth Sciences that describes this program and its strategy.

—Last year's fires on Federal forestlands indicated the need for more timely funding for annual firefighting costs. I therefore propose that two new Federal wild land firefighting accounts be established in the Departments of Agriculture and Interior.

—To further strengthen our energy security, I propose legislation authorizing the sale of the naval petroleum reserves to the private sector in exchange for cash and oil to be added to the strategic petroleum reserve. I also propose the establishment of a separate 10 million barrel defense petroleum inventory.

—To provide for the timely completion of my Reform '88 management improvement program I propose an additional $103 million for 1990, to further improve our management and credit systems.

MAJOR PROGRAMS ARE REFORMED TO ACHIEVE DEFICIT REDUCTION

The program structure and incentives underlying many domestic Federal programs need to be altered to promote greater efficiency and cost-effectiveness.

—Current farm price support programs are far too costly. For the period 1986-89 an estimated $130 billion in Federal spending for farm-related assistance programs provided an average of nearly $600,000 per farmer. Much of this assistance goes to farmers with high incomes—more than twice the U.S. family average. I therefore propose outlay reductions for the price and income support programs of $2 billion in 1990 and additional annual reductions of between $2 and $2.5 billion in each year from 1991 through 1994. In addition, I urge reform of the counterproductive sugar price support program.

—The rapidly rising costs of the medicare program need to be moderated. I propose a reasonable increase in the medicare prospective payment system rate and reductions in hospital capital payments and special graduate medical education payments. Also, in an effort to restrain excessive growth in supplementary medical insurance (SMI) costs, I propose extension of the current law SMI premiums, limitations on physician payments, reductions in payments for certain overpriced procedures, and reforms in the durable medical equipment payment system. Medicare spending would still grow by 9 percent between 1989 and 1990 under these proposals—but not by the 13 percent that would occur under current law.

—I also propose reforms in the medicaid program to reduce spending growth between 1989 and 1990 to $1.7 billion, or 5 percent, rather than the $3.3 billion, or 9 percent, that would occur under current law. These reforms reinstate successful incentives employed in the early 1980's. My budget also proposes restructuring Federal financing of administrative expenses to give States greater incentives to operate their administrative systems as efficiently as possible.

—The Government often continues programs at the Federal level that are either duplicative or are no longer needed, or more appropriately undertaken by other levels of government or the private sector. This is the case with the Economic Development Administration, Amtrak, urban mass transit discretionary grants, and most operating subsidies for the Postal Service. Efforts to reverse this situation have been undertaken by prior administrations as well as my own. These programs should be eliminated. The budget proposes termination of 82 programs that are not needed to satisfy national priorities.

—Under current law, outlays for Federal employee retirement and health benefits are estimated to grow from $51.3 billion in 1989 to $55.9 billion in 1990. I propose freezing retirement cost-of-living allowances (COLAs) and other reforms to hold the 1990 level to slightly above that for 1989, reducing the growth that would otherwise occur by $4.4 billion.

ACHIEVING A PROPER FEDERAL ROLE AND IMPROVING MANAGEMENT

As the Federal Government grew, it took on improper responsibilities, and managed its programs inefficiently. We undertook to return the Federal Government to its proper role. We also initiated a major program to improve the management of the remaining programs. These priorities are continued and expanded in this budget.

PRIVATIZATION

The Government and the private sector should each do what it does best. The Federal Government should not be involved in providing goods and services where private enterprise can do the job cheaper and better.

Accordingly, my budget proposes that a number of Federal enterprises be opened to the private sector, through public offerings or outright sales. Following our success in the sale of Conrail and the sale of $21 billion in selected loan portfolios, I am proposing sale of the naval petroleum reserves, the Alaska Power Administration, and the Southeastern Power Administration. I also propose sale of the Federal Government's helium-processing assets, excess real property, and a further $4.3 billion in loan portfolios. In addition, my budget proposes legislation to establish a government corporation for the uranium enrichment enterprise, as the first step towards eventual privatization.

The Federal Government should also depend more on the private sector to provide ancillary and support services for activities that remain in Federal hands. Therefore, I propose a number of pilot projects and studies in areas such as the private delivery of advertising materials and urgent mail, and the Department of Justice's prison hospitals.

IMPROVED MANAGEMENT

In 1981, I made a promise to the American people "to limit Government to its proper role and make it the servant, not the master, of the people." My "Management Improvement Program: Reform '88" has helped make Government more efficient and more responsive. We reduced waste and fraud in Federal programs by combining the efforts of the inspectors general into the President's Council on Integrity and Efficiency, resulting in over $110 billion saved or put to better use—and their efforts are continuing.

I saw that the Federal Government did not have effective cash management practices for dealing with what is now a $2 trillion annual cash flow, nor did it have a government-wide credit management program for what is now a $1 trillion portfolio. This resulted in the waste of billions of dollars each year. We built the necessary government-wide controls in both areas and stopped the drain.

Moreover, we began the establishment of the first government-wide financial accounting system, consolidating and making uniform over 400 previously incompatible individual agency systems. This was essential for any well-managed government, and is presently being implemented.

The Federal Government has a major effect on our daily lives through the collection of taxes and fees, the direct provisions of services, the payment of financial assistance through various entitlement programs, and the regulation of commercial enterprises. Through modernization, improved administration, and automated services the Government has made substantial reductions in the time it takes to provide services to the public. As the 21st century approaches, the Federal Government must adapt its role in our society to changing conditions and changing technology. At the turn of the century, the U.S. population will exceed 268 million, with a larger proportion of elderly citizens. Changes in technology and communication will increasingly link the world's economies, trade, capital flows, and travel as never before.

The 1990 Management Report, which is being forwarded to the Congress as part of the 1990 budget submission, reflects the highlights of OMB's report to me on "Government of the Future." That Management Report has been expanded as a beginning to a planning process that has, in part, shaped the proposals in this budget and should become a part of the annual budget process.

BUDGET PROCESS REFORM IS DESPERATELY NEEDED TO CONTINUE DEFICIT REDUCTION

The persistence of the budget deficit is overwhelming evidence that the Federal budget process is fundamentally flawed. Past efforts at "reform" have been directed largely toward protecting a large portion of domestic spending from real fiscal discipline. Fourteen years after passage of the Congressional Budget Act and three years after enactment of the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act, the Federal budget process remains unwieldy and undisciplined. The American people expect better of their political system, and they deserve it.

Under the Congressional Budget Act, Congressional budget resolutions—Congress' proposed budgets—are passed each year. They are not sent to the President for approval and, therefore, are not law. They provide guidance to the committees of Congress, but the guidance is often late and ambiguous. The resolutions are usually passed well after the dates required by law, and well after they are needed by the finance, authorizing, and appropriations committees. Moreover, there is little agreement within Congress on the guidance provided. The House of Representatives and the Senate do not agree, except in the most general terms, on the priorities implied by resolutions both have approved.

Except for last year's on-time performance, Congress' self-imposed budget deadlines have usually been missed, and massive continuing resolutions and reconciliation bills have been the rule rather than the exception. These large, cumbersome bills provide cozy hiding places for hundreds of special interest add-ons, which line-item veto authority would permit the President to challenge.

A number of changes in the budget process—most of which I have recommended before—are needed to instill budget discipline throughout the legislative process. I urge Congress to adopt the following measures:

Balanced budget amendment.—I remain committed to and urge approval of a constitutional amendment requiring a balanced budget. The amendment should require a supermajority vote (at least 60 percent) in the Congress to increase taxes.

Line-item veto.—My successors should be given the authority, subject to Congressional override, to veto line-items in annual appropriations bills, in authorizing legislation that provides or mandates funding for programs, and in revenue bills. Such authority would permit the elimination of substantial waste and would be an effective instrument for enforcing budget discipline.

Enhanced rescission authority.—To enhance the President's ability to control Government spending, I recommend that line-item veto authority be complemented by a change in law that would require the Congress to vote "yea" or "nay" on any rescission proposed by the President. Current law allows the Congress to duck responsibility by simply ignoring proposed rescissions for 45 days.

Biennial budgeting.—The annual budget process consumes too much time and energy. A biennial budget would reduce the repetitive budget tasks, allow more time for considering key spending and revenue decisions, provide less scope for gimmicks that give the illusion of "savings," such as shifting spending from one year to another without affecting the underlying programs, and permit the realization of real savings that would be possible with a more assured availability of funds. For these reasons, I recommend that biennial budgeting be adopted.

Joint budget resolution.—To ensure the broader scrutiny and stricter discipline that is needed in the congressional budget process, I propose that Congress be required to prepare a budget resolution covering a minimum of two years showing revenue proposals individually and showing spending priorities. The Congress should also be required to submit its budget resolution to the President for his signature or veto. Subsequent legislation which exceeds these allocations should not be considered without super-majority approval.

Individual transmittal of appropriations bills.—The practice of transmitting full-year continuing resolutions covering a number of appropriations bills does not permit the Legislative and Executive Branches to exercise proper scrutiny of those bills. Too often in the past, such continuing resolutions have provided convenient cover for special-interest spending that would not survive close scrutiny. To minimize this risk, I propose that appropriations bills be transmitted individually to the President.

Credit reform.—The effects of credit activities are recorded imperfectly under current budget accounting. The subsidy component of Federal lending programs remains hidden.

To correct this major fault in the budget system, I recommended credit reform legislation two years ago. This legislation, which I am recommending again, would measure the true cost—the present value—of the subsidies provided by Federal credit programs and put that cost on an expenditure basis equivalent to the cost of other Federal programs. This change must be an integral part of the reform of the budget process.

Measuring the effects of budget proposals.—Budget discipline and lasting deficit reduction would be facilitated if the Legislative and Executive Branches were to use a common set of principles for scoring budget proposals and actions on them. I urge that the Congressional Budget Office and the Office of Management and Budget be charged with the responsibility to develop, in consultation with the budget, finance, authorizing, and appropriations committees, a common set of budget scoring principles for use by the Legislative and Executive Branches.

Adoption of these reforms should enable the Federal Government to make informed decisions in a deliberate fashion that fosters rational priorities. The American people deserve no less from their elected representatives.

CONCLUSION

The accomplishments of the American people in the past eight years will always be for me a source of pride. However, we must continue our recent progress in reducing the Federal deficit.

Deficit reduction is a key national priority, written into law by the G-R-H Act, which, despite its defects, legislated a process to achieve a balanced budget.

This budget achieves the 1990 target of the amended Act, and projects a budget balance in 1993. It preserves legitimate programs for the aged and needy, provides for adequate national security, devotes more resources to other high-priority activities, and accomplishes all this without raising taxes. Tax increases are not needed. History shows that they would simply be used by the Congress to increase spending. Tax increases have been overwhelmingly voted down in the last three Presidential elections.

I call upon the Congress to enact this budget. Higher taxes are not needed—as this budget demonstrates—but genuine deficit reduction through moderating the growth in spending is essential to enable the next Administration and Congress to address the Nation's agenda for the future.

Over the past eight years, we Americans have made our world a safer place for freedom because we had the will to reinvigorate our economy, rebuild our defenses, and provide for the less fortunate among us. Together, we achieved a new beginning for our country and prepared the way for the next Administration to build on our accomplishments.

RONALD REAGAN.

RECOMMENDATIONS FOR EXECUTIVE, LEGISLATIVE, AND JUDICIAL SALARIES

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate:

As required by section 225 of the Federal Salary Act of 1967, Public Law 90-206 (2 U.S.C. 351 et seq.), the latest Quadrennial Commission on Executive, Legislative, and Judicial Salaries ("Commission") has submitted to me recommendations on salaries for Senators, Representatives, Federal judges, Cabinet officers, and other agency heads, and certain other officials in the executive, legislative, and judicial branches.

The statute requires that, in the budget next submitted after receipt of the report of the Commission, I set forth recommendations for adjustment of these salaries. Pursuant to section 225(i), as amended by section 135 of Public Law 99-190, these recommendations will be effective unless Congress disapproves the recommendation by a joint resolution within 30 days following the transmittal of my budget.

The Commission's report, submitted to me on December 14, 1988, documented both the substantial erosion in the real level of Federal executive pay which has occurred since 1969 and the recruitment and retention problems that have resulted, especially for the Federal judiciary. The Commission is to be commended for its diligent and conscientious effort to address the complicated and complex problems associated with Federal pay levels.

The Commission found that Federal executives and legislators have experienced a decline of approximately 35 percent in real salaries since 1969. In contrast, the salaries of General Schedule employees have declined by only 8 percent over the same period. The Commission's recommendations go a long way towards compensating for this salary erosion, but they do not make up the full gap. For example, for an official at Executive Level II, which is also the Congressional salary rate, the salary level adjusted for inflation since 1969 would be $140,340, while the Commission's recommendation is $135,000.

Every one of the Commissions that has met over the past 20 years concluded that a pay increase for key Federal officials was necessary. Each Commission found that pay for senior Government officials fell far behind that of their counterparts in the private sector. They also surmised that we cannot afford a Government composed primarily of those wealthy enough to serve.

In accepting the Commission's salary recommendations, I recognize that we are under a mandate to reduce the Federal deficit and hold the costs of Government to an absolute minimum. Thus, while I have decided to propose a pay increase which accepts in full the salary recommendations made by the Commissioners in their report to me last month, this proposal will not increase the deficit; the funding for the pay increase will be fully absorbed within proposed budget levels.

This increase fulfills my promise made in January 1987, that, assuming continued progress toward eliminating the deficit and favorable economic conditions, I would recommend another step toward overcoming the erosion of real income.

While this represents a substantial increase in salaries, it is coupled with the salutary recommendation of a ban on receipt of all honoraria in all branches of Government. The Commission further recommended that Congress enact legislation to bar officials in the three branches from receiving outside earned income for activities that conflict with the performance of official duties. I endorse these recommendations of the Commission as an appropriate step toward better government. A salary increase and a prohibition on receipt of honoraria together will help ensure that the Government is able to attract and keep talented senior officials and that the questions that arise from outside payments of honoraria are put to rest.

Accordingly, pursuant to subparagraphs (A), (B), (C), and (D) of section 225(f) and section 225(h) of Public Law 90-206 (81 Stat. 643 and 644), as amended:

ECONOMIC REPORT OF THE PRESIDENT—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 101-2)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Joint Committee and ordered to be printed:

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate:

It is with great pride in the accomplishments of the American people that I present my eighth, and final, Economic Report of the President. When I took office 8 years ago there was widespread doubt concerning the ability and resolve of the United States to maintain its economic and political leadership of the Free World. Political events abroad seemed to demonstrate the impotence of American power, while economic events at home raised concerns about the vitality of our system. Throughout most of the 1970s inflation raged at unacceptably high rates, and unemployment moved upward. Stagflation, a name invented for the era, and malaise were the words used to describe America.

Today, it is as if the world were born anew. Those who doubted the resolve, and resilience, of the American people and economy doubt no more. The tide of history, which some skeptics saw as ebbing inevitably away from Western ideals of freedom of thought, expression, and enterprise, flows in our direction. By strengthening our military posture and reaffirming our commitment to the cause of freedom throughout the world, we have restored respect for America and have achieved the first arms control agreement in history to eliminate an entire class of nuclear missiles. And by reducing taxes and regulatory bureaucracy, we have unleashed the creative genius of ordinary Americans and ushered in an unparalleled period of peacetime prosperity. The world today is far safer, and more prosperous, than it was 8 years ago. And the America of today is, once again, brimming with self-confidence and a model for other countries to emulate. To be sure, there are challenges for the future, but I leave office confident that, with continued cooperation between the President and the Congress, America will meet these challenges and, in partnership with its allies, will continue to lead the world toward peace, prosperity, and freedom.

AN HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVE

Barely 40 years have passed since the end of World War II, but how the world has changed during that period. Man has walked on the Moon; products once unimagined are now commonplace; goods once considered luxuries are now necessities of life. Notwithstanding these enormous changes, the prime historical reality of this period has been the rivalry between two competing political and economic systems. One system operates by concentrating power in the hands of the few, by limiting personal freedoms, and by centralizing economic decisions. At its best, it is a system of state paternalism; at its worst, one of tyranny.

The other system believes that power emanates from the individual, not from the state; that the function of government is to serve, not dictate to, individuals. The great democracies recognize that political and economic freedom are indivisible; policies that threaten one of these freedoms inevitably undermine the other. These two divergent systems have vied, sometimes with words and sometimes with swords, for the hearts and minds of the rest of the world.

At the end of World War II the outcome of this competition was, to some, far from certain. Many intellectuals, looking back upon the experience of the depression in the interwar period, felt that the future was with communism. These people felt that capitalism, with its emphasis on the individual and decentralized decisionmaking, could not cope with the complexity of a modern economy. In the years that followed, some countries chose state planning and state ownership over the alleged chaos of the marketplace, while many more countries had this authoritarian system imposed upon them. Centralized control was especially attractive for many newly emerging economies, which felt themselves impoverished from, and were resentful of, their colonial experience. These countries turned inward, to highly regulated economies that shunned open markets and international trade as the path to prosperity, and instead sought self-sufficiency.

Today, few doubt which of these systems will emerge triumphant. Comparisons of economies with common cultures and people, such as North and South Korea, East and West Germany, or the People's Republic of China and Hong Kong or Taiwan, uniformly show that systems that emphasized individual initiative, open markets, and personal freedoms—as opposed to collective action—have prospered most. Developing economies have increasingly recognized the benefits of the market system as they have undertaken reforms to reduce the role of government and to increase the role of international trade. Most recently, this trend has even embraced the two largest proponents of state control, as first China and now the Soviet Union have reluctantly recognized that the true chains on individual fulfillment are an overbearing government that destroys motivation and freedom.

Viewed from the perspective of one who remembers well events of 40 years ago, the prosperity that we enjoy today is extraordinary. The economic growth experienced by countries that chose the path of economic and political freedom is virtually unparalleled in human history. This economic success is attributable to all nations that joined in pursuing market-oriented policies at home and in reducing barriers to trade among nations.

Americans can take a special pride in this postwar record. American aid to Western Europe and Japan helped rebuild those war-torn regions. America took the lead in fostering negotiations that reduced trade barriers and created international institutions that promoted financial stability and reconstruction. Open American markets not only benefited consumers at home, but also sped recovery abroad. And America took the lead in preserving the freedoms and prosperity we all enjoy. As Winston Churchill said in 1952: "What other nation in history, when it became supremely powerful, has had no thought of territorial aggrandizement, no ambition but to use its resources for the good of the world? I marvel at America's altruism, her sublime disinterestedness."

THE ROLE OF GOVERNMENT

As I said in my first Inaugural Address, "If we look to the answer as to why for so many years we achieved so much, prospered as no other people on Earth, it was because here in this land we unleashed the energy and individual genius of man to a greater extent than has ever been done before." The central role of government must be to nurture this genius, not to shackle it in a morass of regulations or to tax away the incentives for innovation.

This is not to deny that there are vital functions that a government must perform, but it must always do so in the least intrusive and costly fashion. The guiding philosophy of my Administration has been to leave to private initiative all functions that individuals can effectively perform for themselves, and when government action is necessary, to use the level of government closest to the community for all the public functions it can effectively handle. Federal Government action should be reserved only for those functions that require national attention. In this way government will least interfere with private incentives and will be most responsive to the wishes of the people it serves.

The Federal Government, of necessity, must provide for the national defense. Only through strength can we maintain peace and secure freedom and prosperity for ourselves and all free nations. But we must ensure that our defense money is spent wisely, not on pork-barrel projects, such as maintaining military bases that are no longer necessary. This Administration, through its words and its deeds, has shown its commitment to protecting the health and financial security of our elderly. Similarly, the government must provide a safety net for the Nation's poor, but it must do so in a way that promotes individual initiative. Too often, government programs, created with the best of intentions, serve to prolong, rather than eliminate, poverty.

There are some limited circumstances in which government regulation of private activity may be beneficial. Few would doubt that some rules are needed to protect the Nation's water and air from pollution. However, it is imperative that all such rules and regulations be based on sound economic principles that minimize the intrusion on private decisions. Whether well or poorly designed, whether aimed at worthy or dubious objectives, these rules have one thing in common: They "tax" and "spend" billions of dollars of private funds, unconstrained by public budget or appropriations controls.

The main role of government is to provide a stable economic environment that allows each individual to reach his or her full potential. Individuals and businesses must be able to make long-run plans confident that the government will not change the rules halfway through the game. Government's drain on the economy, both through its use of resources that could be used more productively by the private sector and through taxes that destroy individual incentives, must be minimized. This Administration's long-term view of fiscal policy, which abandoned the outmoded emphasis on fine-tuning the economy, has set the basis for the record peacetime expansion we currently enjoy. This policy, in conjunction with responsible monetary policy, has led to a sizable decrease in both unemployment rates and inflation over the past 8 years. I am pleased to say that my Administration is the first in more than a generation that can lay claim to this accomplishment.

The government's economic role in the international sphere should be similarly circumspect. It is the primary responsibility of governments to promote sound and stable financial markets that encourage international commerce and to reduce barriers to trade at home and abroad. Reducing these barriers will allow markets, not governments, to determine the goods that society produces. Too often policies designed to preserve jobs in one industry reduce competitiveness and employment in other industries. A creative, competitive America is the answer to a changing world, not trade wars that close doors, create greater barriers, and destroy millions of jobs. We should always remember: Protectionism is destructionism. America's jobs, America's growth, America's future depend on trade—trade that is free, open, and fair.

THE RECORD OF THE PAST 8 YEARS

In my first Inaugural Address I stated, "The economic ills we suffer have come upon us over several decades. They will not go away in days, weeks, or months, but they will go away." After a shaky start, necessitated by the sorry state of the economy in 1980, we now have a peacetime economy entering an unprecedented 7th year of expansion. The length, strength, and resilience of this expansion are ample testimony to the wisdom of the policies that we have pursued.

During this expansion, real GNP has risen by more than 4 percent a year, nearly double the growth rate of the previous 8 years. The growth in employment and jobs has been phenomenal; nearly 19 million nonagricultural jobs have been created during this period, with nearly 3.5 million new jobs created in the first 11 months of 1988. Furthermore, this remarkable expansion has benefited all segments of the population. While civilian employment has increased by more than 17 percent, Hispanic employment has grown by more than 45 percent, black employment by nearly 30 percent, and female employment by more than 20 percent. The decline in unemployment rates is equally dramatic—the overall unemployment rate has been cut in half, down to levels not seen in 14 years. And, assertions to the contrary, the jobs created are good ones; over 90 percent of the new jobs are full-time, and over 85 percent of these full-time jobs are in occupations in which average annual salaries exceed $20,000.

Unlike previous experiences, this expansion has been accomplished without simultaneously fueling inflation. The average inflation rate during this period, as measured by the GNP deflator, has been barely one-third the rate of inflation that prevailed in 1980. The scourge of inflation, which served as a hidden tax on the American people and diverted productive resources to unproductive uses, has been brought under control here and in our major trading partners. This, in turn, has led to a dramatic decline in interest rates, which, while still high by historic standards, are far lower than they were in January 1981. In short, we have achieved the objectives that eluded us during the 1970s—rapid economic growth and declining inflation rates.

This record has been achieved not through alchemy, but by using that good old-fashioned recipe of reducing the role of government. Too often the government has sought to solve problems best left to the private sector; and too often these solutions have had devastating side effects. We have at last learned that more government is not the solution to our problem; often it is the problem.

Our New Beginning has restored personal incentives through a series of tax reforms and tax cuts. These reforms have reduced the top Federal marginal income tax rate to less than one-half the level that prevailed when we took office and decreased tax liabilities at all income levels. The Tax Reform Act of 1986 improved efficiency by eliminating many tax preferences that distort private decisionmaking. By reducing tax rates and tax loopholes, we have encouraged people to make money the old-fashioned way—by producing goods and services that people want, not by finding new ways to avoid taxes. The tax reforms have increased equity as well, as an estimated 4 million low-income individuals and families have been removed from the income tax rolls by 1988. If imitation is the sincerest form of praise, then the fact that many other major industrial powers have also cut their tax rates is praise indeed.

These tax reforms, combined with regulatory reforms that will result in billions of dollars of saving over this decade, have helped spur productivity growth. Since 1981, manufacturing productivity has grown at an average annual rate exceeding 4 percent, triple the rate for the preceding 8 years and nearly 50 percent faster than that for the period 1948–73. This productivity growth, combined with exchange-rate changes, has led to a surge in U.S. exports that puts to rest the notion that U.S. industry is no longer competitive.

We have also made progress in reining in government expenditures, but much still needs to be done. We have reduced the rate of growth of Federal spending, and over the past 5 years government spending as a percent of GNP has fallen from 25.1 to 23.2 percent. Significant progress has also been made in reducing the budget deficit, both in absolute terms and as a percent of GNP, but further progress can be made only by reducing government spending. Tax increases would only threaten the enormous progress that has been made so far.

Our successes extend to the international sphere as well. The strong U.S. recovery, coupled with a weaker recovery abroad, helped create a sizable U.S. trade deficit. While the trade deficit has been significantly reduced during the past year as a result of our surging exports, it has served as an excuse for those seeking protection from foreign competition. Protectionism, like most forms of government intervention in the economy, serves only to enrich the few at the expense of the many. We have successfully resisted this protectionist pressure, while pursuing major trade liberalization efforts abroad.

The Israel-United States Free-Trade Agreement was the first such agreement entered into by the United States. The recently implemented Free-Trade Agreement with Canada represents an historic step forward for two staunch allies. In addition to creating the world's largest free-trade area between two countries and generating large benefits for both countries, it serves as a model of what can be accomplished in other negotiating forums. The United States remains committed to full multilateral liberalization, as reflected in the fact that we are the driving force behind the current Uruguay Round of multilateral negotiations under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. While these negotiations are not scheduled to conclude until 1990, the results of the recent Mid-term Review indicate that they will result in significant reductions in trade barriers and a significant expansion in trade coverage.

Rather than succumbing to protectionist pressures at home, we have vigorously combatted unfair trade barriers abroad. This was the first Administration to seek, on its own initiative, changes in foreign trade practices that harmed American business. These policies have helped reduce foreign trade barriers and given American companies a chance to compete on equal terms.

THE CHALLENGES AHEAD

As proud as I am of these and many other accomplishments, I will be the first to admit that the agenda is not yet completed. First, and foremost, is a need to reform the budget process and to bring Federal spending under control. The large budget deficit that this Nation faces is not a result of too few taxes, but too much spending. Strong economic growth and the base-broadening effect of tax reform have led to sizable increases in Federal receipts. According to current projections, these receipts will have increased by over $375 billion between fiscal years 1981 and 1989, but spending will have increased more rapidly—by more than $450 billion over this 8-year period. Projections indicate that Federal revenue will grow by more than $80 billion during the next fiscal year. All that is required to reduce the deficit is to halt, or moderate, the increase in expenditures.

Gramm-Rudman-Hollings is a first step toward bringing the deficit under control. However, further progress toward reform of the budget process is needed. Under current practice, funding for special-interest groups is combined with vital appropriations, leaving the President the choice between vetoing the entire package or accepting some funding that he knows is not in the national interest. To prevent this waste of taxpayers' money, the President needs what most governors already have—a line-item veto and enhanced rescission authority.

Moreover, the current budget process places no real restraint on congressional appropriations, because expanded spending on one program does not require reduced spending on other programs. Too often the temptation is to raise taxes, not lower spending. A law that requires a super majority of the Congress to approve waivers of spending limits or tax limits would help ensure that taxpayers' hard-earned dollars are spent wisely, and that the temptation to increase tax burdens is resisted. Furthermore, reform of government credit operations is required to limit new subsidies and to guarantee that the true costs of these measures are not hidden from public scrutiny. These reforms, together with the balanced budget amendment that I have repeatedly endorsed, would guarantee the fiscal prudence that is needed to sustain the dramatic expansion of the past 6 years. Limiting government expenditures would also help stimulate the private investment that is required to ensure that the next generation of Americans can look forward to the same increase in living standards that previous generations have enjoyed.

Despite the enormous progress we have already made in bringing down inflation, there is still work to be done. Inflation is a hidden, insidious way of taxing the American people. Price stability, not merely lowered inflation, is the key to maintaining the vigor of the American economy and the strong international role of the dollar. Stable, predictable monetary policy can provide the type of price stability that benefits not only our own economy, but also provides significant benefits to those developing countries that are so dependent upon us.

Perhaps most importantly, the challenge for the future is to maintain and expand upon the progress we have made in taking economic decisions away from the government and returning them to the private sector, where they properly belong. Governments are notoriously bad at identifying "industries of the future," and efforts to have the government formulate and implement industrial policy must be strongly resisted. For decades, government policies throughout the world have distorted agricultural production and trade. Adoption of our bold proposal to phase out these policies in the United States and other major producing countries would result in enormous efficiency gains. And, while major deregulatory gains have been made, much more can be accomplished. Reduced regulation of vital sectors, including transportation, energy, and financial industries, has led to significant increases in productivity and to sizable gains for consumers. Further deregulation of the financial sector can help preserve this country's position as the financial capital of the world. Finally, we must resist pressure to increase government requirements for mandated benefits. These programs, while well-intentioned, increase costs, reduce labor market flexibility, and reduce productivity. They undermine the competitiveness of American business and they ultimately hurt the very people they are supposed to benefit.

CONCLUSION

In 8 short years, we have reversed a 50-year trend of turning to the government for solutions. We have relearned what our Founding Fathers knew long ago—it is the people, not the government, who provide the vitality and creativity that make a great nation. Just as the first American Revolution, which began with the shot heard 'round the world, inspired people everywhere who dreamed of freedom, so has this second American revolution inspired changes throughout the world. The message that we brought to Washington—reduce government, reduce regulation, restore incentives—has been heard around the world.

I leave office secure in the knowledge that these policies have worked, and confident that this great Nation will continue to lead the way toward freedom and prosperity for all mankind.

PASSIVE FOREIGN INVESTMENT COMPANIES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COYNE] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. COYNE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986. The purpose of this legislation is to ensure that certain corporations are not subject to the provisions of section 1296, the section that establishes and defines passive foreign investment companies [PFIC's].

This bill is similar to H.R. 5429, which several of my colleagues and I introduced in the last Congress. However, there is one difference between H.R. 5429 and the legislation introduced today: We eliminated the section of H.R. 5429 requiring that the foreign corporation be treated as a resident under the laws of the foreign country.

Otherwise, last year's bill and this year's bill are identical. Because of that, my statement today is similar to the one I made on the floor last year, when we first introduced H.R. 5429.

The United States usually imposes a tax on U.S. shareholders of a foreign corporation only when the shareholder receives the corporation's earnings in the form of a dividend.

One exception to this deferral is set forth in subpart F of the Internal Revenue Code. According to the General Explanation of the Tax Reform Act of 1986, prepared by the staff of the Joint Committee on Taxation, "* * * under these provisions, income from certain 'tax haven' or other activities conducted by corporations controlled by U.S. shareholders is taxed currently to the corporation's U.S. shareholders without regard to whether they actually receive the income currently in the form of a dividend."

Another exception to the deferral principle is the foreign personal holding company [FPHC] provision. Under subpart F, if a foreign corporation is controlled by U.S. stockholders, those U.S. shareholders who own at least 10 percent are taxed currently on their share of the firm's passive investment income. Further, if a corporation is controlled by five or fewer U.S. shareholders, and the income of the corporation is primarily from passive investment, then each shareholder is taxed currently on the corporation's passive investment income.

The 1986 Tax Reform Act expanded the scope of current taxation so as to include some types of income not currently taxed under subpart F or the FPHC provisions. The law did this by establishing passive foreign investment companies.

A passive foreign investment company [PFIC] is defined by the act to mean any foreign corporation that meets one of two criteria: Either 75 percent or more of its income for the taxable year consists of passive income; or, 50 percent or more of the average value of its assets consists of assets that produce, or are held for the production of, passive income.

The Joint Committee print points out that "the Congress did not believe that tax rules should effectively operate to provide U.S. investors tax incentives to make investments outside the United States rather than inside the United States."

As a member of the Ways and Means Committee that drafted the 1986 TRA I can confirm that this was indeed our objective. However, in the process of achieving this objective we must make certain that the law does not have any unintended results.

The Deputy Assistant Secretary of Treasury for Tax Policy is quoted in a statement made before the Subcommittee on Taxation and Debt Management of the Senate Finance Committee as saying that, "we are concerned that the passive asset test operates to throw too broad a category of companies into PFIC status."

The Treasury official goes on to say that, "we believe that the level of a foreign corporation's passive assets generally is not relevant, except to the extent that the assets either generate current passive income to the corporation or reflect the accumulation of current passive income within a lower tier corporation."

Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which would amend this section of the 1986 Tax Reform Act. Joining me are Mr. DONNELLY, Mrs. KENNELLY, Mr. MCGRATH, Mr. DOWNEY, Mr. FOLEY, and Mr. ATKINS. Five of the original cosponsors were involved in drafting the 1986 TRA.

Our legislation would narrow the applicability of the PFIC provision, but it would do so in a manner that respects the original objectives of the 1986 Tax Reform Act.

The bill would amend section 1296 of the code by establishing 1296(e).

The new subsection provides that, in certain circumstances, the 50-percent asset test would be waived. First, the foreign corporation must be a controlled foreign corporation, as defined in subpart F. Second, the company must be located in a country which had a deficit in its balance of trade with the United States. And third, such a corporation must engage in substantial manufacturing or production during the taxable year in such foreign country.

Mr. Speaker, we believe that there is a nexus between the manufacturing operations of U.S. firms [PFIC's] and the trade balance favorable to the United States. We also think that if the 50-percent asset test for PFIC's remains without any consideration given to the origin of the passive assets—in this case, the profit from the manufacturing operations—then U.S. trade with certain countries may be adversely affected. I want to stress that this legislation would only address the 50-percent asset section of the definition. This section contains the more stringent of the two criteria.

For example, we know that Ireland which, according to the Department of Commerce, had a trade deficit with the United States that exceeded $600 million last year, imports items related to U.S. manufacturing operations in Ireland. If the investment decisions in the manufacturing sector are made because of the PFIC provisions, we may inadvertently reduce those imports from the United States. This we do not want to do.

Since we first introduced this legislation, we have received several suggestions which would have broadened the scope of the origin bill. We have not adopted these proposals, primarily because we agree with the intent of the 1986 TRA in this case. And, second, we were concerned about the revenue loss if the scope of the original bill were enlarged.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation is important to make certain that the PFIC provisions of the 1986 TRA as written, do not adversely affect the competitive position of U.S. firms. I commend it to my colleagues.

REMEMBERING BILL NICHOLS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, William L. Ball III, the Secretary of the Navy, wrote a very fine article for the Washington Post about our former colleague, Congressman Bill Nichols of Alabama.

I agree with Will Ball that we will miss the leadership Bill Nichols brought to the area of national defense. His constituents will miss a very effective spokesman in Washington and I will miss him because he was one of my best friends in Congress.

I want to share Will Ball's article with my colleagues.

The article follows:

REMEMBER BILL NICHOLS

(By William L. Ball III)

There will be sensed a missing presence as members of the House of Representatives are sworn in at the Capitol today. Sadly, the Third District of Alabama will not be represented, its citizens having gathered to bury their Congressman ten days before Christmas.

To colleagues, constituents, and those both in and out of government who knew him, Bill Nichols was a man of uncommon strength and uncommon virtue. His way was that of one who had been tested by hardship time and again, who had bested obstacles few would ever confront, and yet who instinctively never forgot the simple rule at the core of his steady values. To exercise good sense, which was his practice, he knew that a Congressman had to remember who he was . . . and where he came from.

To fellow southerners, he was a model public man, admired for his considerate treatment of people from all stations in life, his agreeable manner and his genuine interest in the circumstances of other . . . his selflessness, unquestioned integrity, and the strength of his convictions. For a time in Alabama he was a cotton man, which meant above all he was fair. Always fair.

So obvious were these qualities in Bill Nichols and so sudden his departure from us that no amount of mourning can compensate for the tributes he deserved here but never received. So many were those whom he inspired in the old-fashioned way—not by image but by living example—that he leaves empty on this day far more than one seat in the House.

There is a diminished roster now in the Congress of those who had a part in two of the traumas of this the American century. Bill Nichols saw what the Great Depression wrought on the rural South—his eleventh birthday was two weeks before the stock market cash. Twelve years later he left Auburn University for combat service in the German forests on the front lines of World War II. Those experiences gave to Bill Nichols and thousands of others who survived war and depression an extraordinary and even historic determination to succeed, to serve, and to create opportunities for America's next generation.

And that's exactly what they did. With an impact and reach none could foresee in 1945, they rebuilt, retooled, and regenerated over the span of four decades a country that without them surely would not have hit full stride.

So, of the achievements of Bill Nichols and the legacy of his generation, my generation ought to pause and take note. The gentleman from Alabama worked hard to preclude the repetition of mistakes for which his generation paid an awful price. The lessons of his remarkable life are many and the good of the republic requires that they be heeded. And were he here today and asked by the freshman House Members in the class of '88 what one thing they above all should do . . . well, he would smile, and with that good-natured twinkle in his eye suggest quietly that a Congresman ought to always remember who he is . . . and where he comes from.

NOISE REDUCTION IN ALAMEDA, CA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. STARK] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to encourage the Port of Oakland to reduce noise in residential areas near the Oakland International Airport.

A simple solution to the noise problem exists that will satisfy residents without unduely impeding airport operations. By diverting night flights to runways with an approach over the San Francisco Bay, the airport can promote peace and quiet in residential neigborhoods while still accommodating air traffic. For years, the Port of Oakland has dragged its feet in addressing the airport noise problem. It is now time that Oakland International join with airports around the Nation in becoming a responsible neighbor to the surrounding communities.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON BANKING, FINANCE AND URBAN AFFAIRS

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RAHALL). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GONZALEZ] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise to render a report by way of accountability with respect to the course of action thus far taken by the now constituted Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs. I think the record should show that I have been a member of this committee since I arrived as a Member of the U.S. House of Representatives some 27 years and 4 months ago.

In any event, I have opted to stay on that committee even though I had a chance at one time to join the Ways and Means Committee and yielded to my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PICKLE], to enable him to get on the Ways and Means Committee. I could also have gained the prestigious membership of the Appropriations Committee as well as the Rules Committee, but I have opted to stay because this has been a field of interest ever since I have held political elective office.

When I was on the city council of the city of San Antonio, I developed expertise on the budgetary and financial intricacies of the municipality. When I went to the State senate I did the same thing. The State of Texas has a rather unique system where the powers are really divided and shared in the State and Texas because of the 1875 Reconstruction constitution or post-Reconstruction constitution in which fearful as the Texans were then of what they called the carpetbagger Governors, they constructed a constitution that divested the Governor of almost all powers, gave him a very small modicum of appointing powers to some boards and commissions, and that was about it, and placed the bulk of that overwhelming power in the State legislature where they felt those citizens out in those areas in Texas at that time, feeling gravely and unjustly treated by what they called the carpetbaggers regimes, felt they had control over those representatives. So our State constitution of Texas has some 300-plus amendments, mostly because through the sheer course of developments it has been necessary to dilute and delegate some of those powers vested in the State Legislature of the State of Texas.

The comptroller, which is an elective position in the State of Texas and is the man who really has control of the purse strings was someone who I made it a point to go over and introduce myself to and become well-versed with the intricacies of the comptroller system, and it enabled me, for instance, to fight successfully the first legitimate budgets for the State park system, which when I arrived in the State senate in 1957 amounted to $250,000. In the city of San Antonio, we had a budget of $2.5 million for our city park system. So it was my amendment in 1957 to the finance bill that brought one of the first realistic attempts to budget for this wonderful, wonderful State of Texas park system. It is one of the greatest systems in our Nation.

Incidentally, in the State senate I was the chairman of the State finance committee. It was the State banking committee, and so when I came here I was delighted that I was assigned to the Banking Committee. I was the one of three of us that were sworn in in the middle of the 87th Congress that was assigned to a major standing committee, and of course, that is the Banking Committee.

So I have remained there because first of its range of activity that is so wide and so important. There was a lot of political pressure for me to belong to the Armed Services Committee because of the tremendous historical, national defense outposts that are indentified with my hometown of San Antonio. But at that time I knew that because of the seniority system, which I respected, it would not be possible. But I also had had the experience in the State senate of knowing that it was not what committee you were assigned to, it is what you yourself did with your dedication, with your purposes, with your work, and with whatever efficiency you could muster up in handling whatever line of activity.

But in this great body, the U.S. House of Representatives, the beauty of it is that if there is any particular field of interest that any Member wishes to exercise concern about or devote time to, the field is immeasurable because it is the whole gamut of our activities and human activities in our country. The title of it now is the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs. When I came to the Congress, the title of it was the Banking and Currency Committee. That had been its traditional name. It is one of the more historical committees, but it is not one of the original, fundamental committees. As a matter of historical fact, the Banking Committee was derived from what was originally the Ways and Means Committee. But it is now of such a vast range of responsibility, oversight, and jurisdiction, and with the events that are now emerging and daily increasing in seriousness, intensity, and awesomeness, it becomes imperative that my colleagues be informed as to what the intentions are as outlined by myself as the newly elected chairman of the Banking Committee.

I have always looked upon such positions as chairmanships as having only one real basic power, and that is the power to set the agenda, to set the course, to make the path, to blaze the trail, so to speak, with its multiple body in the committee which is now 51 members. When I came to the Congress it was 31 members, which was the exact size of the State Senate of the State of Texas. In that first year, the pace of activity was so different. It was another environment. I do not recall the committee having full committee meetings more than three times that first year. The chairman then was about to retire. The pace was different even in the whole House itself. Seldom did we have recorded votes. Seldom did we have business other than on Tuesdays and maybe Wednesdays, and that was about it.

But nevertheless, times change and the Congress has changed with it. The Legislative Reform Act of 1974 brought about vast changes and growth in the size and composition of the committee, in the size of some of the subcommittees. We are still in the throes of straightening out, ironing out, and perfecting the reforms that were visualized in the 1974 act.

My premise, basically, is that in a multiple body, and this is where I love to serve, and I have had the privilege that few people in the world have of serving on all three levels of the legislative bodies, on the local, the city council of the city of San Antonio 3 years, on the State level in the State Senate of Texas for 5 years, and now in the Congress going on 28 years, those are privileges that I just have no words with which to express my profound respect and feeling for them. In no other country do I know where this opportunity would have been presented to an individual with no particular claims to either economic or social or other advantage of position.

So aware of that, and aware of the fact that this is the activity I have discovered I love above all, and knowing that it is in the give-and-take of many heads, many minds, brilliant, great Members that the people elect and send to our Congresses. It has always been true, the people know what they do. I have never shared some of the skepticism that people in power seem to have about people in general, because my experience is that, as a whole, and as a conglomerate, the people are always somewhat ahead of us. As a matter of fact, in the legislative actions that I consider my accomplishments, the majority have been stemmed and flowed from ideas and recommendations originating from just plain, ordinary citizens out in the constituency.

For instance, the John F. Kennedy half dollar commemorative coin, I was the author of that bill and I introduced it the Monday following the assassination. And that bill was originated because a constituent called me long distance to advise me about the law governing coinage of coins that I was not aware of. And that was that in 1957 or thereabouts, the Congress had passed a law in which it was decided that only every 25 years would a design of a coin be changed. And this constituent was so informed that he said the only eligible coin is the Franklin half dollar "and I would suggest that a bill be introduced to coin one in memory of our President." And I did so. And it was approved quickly.

It became what we now know as the John F. Kennedy half dollar. But that idea did not originate with me; it came from a plain, ordinary, vanilla constituent back home. I could also name at least half a dozen other legislative enactments that are now law that originated that way.

In the case of the banking situation today, the committee had been in the throes of great issues that had emerged because of the rapid change in the world of technology, in the world of communication and in the contraction of the world.

In my case I have been speaking out on these issues every one of these 27 years so that some of the issues that now seem to emerge anew are some that I have been addressing, and some of the newer ones such as the development of the European monetary system and the European currency unit, the ECU, as far as I know I have been the only Member of Congress discussing that, even mentioning it. And I have done that since 1979, immediately after the summit, the economic summit meeting in Bonn in 1979. President Carter was President. The communique then announced, as the last sentence in this brief communique, that the ministers and the leaders agreed in principle to the European monetary system, the EMS, and the European currency unit, the ECU.

Now nobody seemed to be much interested even though it was, in my opinion, one of the more serious developments coming over the horizon that would, together with a combination of other events that traced their history back to the late fifties and early sixties such as the international trade imbalance, the great instability in the international currency markets which were somewhat controlled because of the fixed exchange rates that were the law then, but which were obvious, as well as the international arrangement known as the Bretton Woods arrangement, it was obvious that the world was no longer a 1944-47 world. It was changing. Europe was restored. It was regaining a highly competitive position in the industrial and manufacturing world and in the financial world. It was obvious that the United States could no longer afford the luxury of looking at that world as a 1947 world. Unfortunately, that still exists, even in the case of defense. As I have been pointing out on quite a number of occasions that when we approach our budget on defense, that it still is predicated at $315 billion, on an aspect of Europe that is a 1947 Europe. And, of course, that is a tragic error.

I do not know what time and events will bring about, as in the case of the financial on the international level; all I do know is that now, as Europe is about to complete its projected integration where we will have not a common market but a single market, where the EMS and the ECU are quite in place, and whether Great Britain joins or not I think is immaterial, because it is in place. And if the ECU, with the umbrella of the EMS can afford to present to the world a stable system of currency interchanges and interactions, there is no question that it is just a matter of time before the dollar is supplanted as the international reserve unit.

Now a lot of my colleagues seem to think that means nothing. I do not expect the average citizen who is far removed from these areas of discussion to much understand even though there is this sixth-sense feeling among my constituents because it is intricate. But I think the big difference is this: As I was warning in 1979 that if, in addition to this development, there are other concurrent events that would impact on us because of external forces over which we no longer had any control, that then we would be faced with a serious dilemma of America confronting a real frontal assault on what we call the American standard of living, its economic well-being, and above all, being replaced as the leader that it has been and is entitled to continue to be if, if we are entitled to it. And to be entitled to it we have got to ride ahead and above these issues and abreast of these issues. And what I see with this emerging and, in 1979, unforeseen and unexpected development where our country is now the largest debtor country in the world—and that has been true just the last 4 years—for the first time 4 years ago the United States became a debtor nation since 1914. When you add that to the picture, and then I hear all these economists coming before our committee saying "Oh, yes" and all of the monetary and regulatory agencies saying "Oh, yes, the reason we have this trade imbalance and noncompetitiveness is because the dollar is priced too high; we have got to let it fall." And when I ask these preeminent economists—and I am not an economist, I am just a Member of the House of Representatives, a politician if you please, but it is common sense to me that if you want to let the dollar fall you must be assured you have the power to control.

My question to the economists, the leading ones in the country was "What is to prevent a free fall once you start that?" They could not answer it. Why? Because they know and I know, as well, that there is no way that once you start a certain movement, given instability, a free fall—and that, of course, would mean that the value of the dollar would be of such a nature that with the overhang of the dollar-holders and seeking a more stable and substantial means of their money, they would seek a more stable currency unit. And, of course, the dollar would be supplanted.

Now I cannot think of anything worse happening to us at this juncture while we are still a debtor nation, because what that means is that instead of paying back our debts in our money that we ourselves coined, we will be paying it back in foreign exchange, in foreign money. And that, I think, we do not need a textbook to see is an ominous thing.

The committee is prepared to enter this bramble patch as it has others. We started out immediately after the Congress was convened on January 3 and we had two hearings, one on January 4 and 5 on the lesser developed countries or Third World, as it is called, which I do not like to call it that because that implies that the world can be broken up into first, second and third worlds, which is absolutely not true.

We are all members of this earthly planet, and there is no such thing as that, in my opinion. what we do have is this: At one time our country was a lesser developed country. In fact, it was still pretty much that during the last century. At least that is the way it was considered in the realm of high international finance. When President Roosevelt managed to bring about the decision to build the Panama Canal after the French had failed, he could do it only because we had to go to France to borrow $40 million from the French bankers. We were a debtor nation. That was at the turn of the century and at the time of the construction of the Panama Canal.

But then, by 1914, America became a creditor nation, and so in two World Wars America was the only creditor nation, and it was our credit more than anything else that enabled our allies to stand alive for more than 6 months. I think Americans ought to know that, and I think the world should never forget it. But it does forget, and it will. If we are careless in handling our heritage and we are willing, as I have said repeatedly on this House floor, to forsake our heritage for a mess of pottage, then on whom do we cast blame other than ourselves?

I believe and have believed at all times that the only thing one as a Representative really can do is to vote, to register his voice and to vote. That is all he can do. So I have made use of that, because I feel in using my voice I am rendering an accounting. How else are my constituents going to know how I think, what I believe, and what I stand for? I do not want to run for public office under false flags, and I never have. And the people nevertheless have come through, even on the most passionate and divisive of issues and facing what seemed to be overwhelming odds.

But actually what is overwhelming if the people are with us? And why would the people be with us? If they are fully knowledgeable and we are right, I can assure my colleagues that they will be with us in this so-called case of the financial crisis confronting us. This is not something of a sudden making, anymore than the international situation. But it could be, and it will be. So there is good reason where, under the overarching thesis of the Nation's economy, we embarked immediately on the scheduling of hearings in the full committee on January 4 and 5. For the first time that I know of in legislative history we brought the finance minister of Costa Rica and the Ambassador who accompanied him so they could tell us their side. We also had sitting next to them at the table a representative from our world of banking finances, representatives from the highest levels.

We wanted to hear from them the bankers' side of this tremendous debt overhang, where our principal banks have reached out and made available tremendous sums in the way of loans, particularly since 1979, which was the first time I took this floor and reported that fact.

The only one that seemed to have noticed it was the then Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, Arthur Burns, may his soul rest in peace. He has since died. He was a great American, and I think he realized what I was striving to report. We had discussions together.

Unfortunately, even as late as 1985, when President Reagan went to the economic summit again in Bonn, the reports in our papers indicated he went there just to lay a wreath at the Bitburg Cemetery, but the truth was that that was the final meeting in which the ECU and EMS were fleshed out. As a matter of fact, I reported to this House before the summit meeting, somewhere around May 1 or 5, 1985, that the finance ministers of these other countries, the Big Six or Big 10, depending on whether the other four came in, had met in Palermo, Italy, and had had the arrangements all fleshed out to present them at the summit in Bonn.

So that was the real issue that developed from that summit in 1985. The rest is history. Today the ECU is valued at $1.25. They have such an interchange that a student at the university in Italy can obtain a $5,000 ECU loan to study at the university in Paris, or for that matter in Luxembourg, or for that matter in Brussels or perhaps in Germany. All of this is in place now because the currency unit is in place, and is valued at $1.25 because they have reserves.

As a matter of fact, in 1975 the decision was made to repeal the 1932 act. By way of a misnomer, that was called the Private Gold Ownership Prohibition Act. It was really more than that. But when the decision was made to repeal that, I was the only one on the committee that resisted it, because the repeal was outright. There were no residue mechanisms to protect us from the speculation on the part of some of our financial institutions in this very speculative market, this highly controlled market known as the international gold market. And then the Secretary, to my astonishment, proclaimed he was going to have gold sales from our gold stock. So I talked to him. It was the then Secretary, Bill Simon.

So all this history has accumulated. I feel that no man has been better prepared—maybe equally prepared, but not better prepared and not better experienced and not having matters better thought out, because that, I feel, is the essential training, in assuming the chairmanship of the Banking Committee.

So we began with this theme of the Third World debt and its implications. The regulators, great men in themselves, came, and the chairman of the FDIC and the Comptroller of the Currency came and testified, too. The private banking industry representatives testified. We also had this testimony, as I said, from the finance minister of Costa Rica. We had testimony from the United Nations UNICEF and the British Vice Chairman of the Educational Fund. He reported the impact of the debt-servicing burdens that all of these countries were experiencing and pointed out they were in effect having to curtail vastly needed social services, such basic things as inoculations and the like. And there has been a cost in human lives, with the fact that half a million children died in that part of the world, and that could be directly attributable to the reduction in some of these services.

Those were disturbing reports. But they gave us an idea of the interrelationship and how intricate it is today, how we cannot isolate the problems of the S&L's and the problems of the debt overhang on the part of the banks.

So my main thought is that we in the Congress should anticipate that we should not wait for a crisis, that we should anticipate and enact whatever is possible within our constitutional system legislatively, in anticipation and as a contingency. So we set the hearings under the main theme of the state of the economy. We had these two hearings, and then on the 10th, 1 week later, last week, we had the Chairman of the Home Loan Bank Board, because the citizenry was literally up in arms, and that was reflected in the comments made to me the day we convened the Congress by my colleagues because of the rapid blizzard of announcements before the end of the year on some deals that were put together by the Home Loan Bank Board of which the Congress never has had more information than that contained in the press releases.

So that was not tolerable, and together with the distinguished ranking minority member, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE], and up to now I have proceeded strictly on a bipartisan basis with his tremendous help, we then invited the Chairman of the Home Loan Bank Board to come with us as soon as possible, which was the following Tuesday, last Tuesday, and we had an all-day session. The benefit of that session was that we finally obtained some information that we had not been given before.

Since November, when it was obvious that it would be certain I would be elected chairman, I was able to obtain members of the staff, and I have made no changes. When I was elected chairman of the Subcommittee on Housing in 1981, I was the only chairman elected to anything that did not fire anybody or put in his own, so to speak, because I have worked on the other side most of my life, and I know what it is, and I am respectful. To me the main thing is to do the job, and, when the staff does it and does it preeminently, as this has so far, by golly, it is going to be respected, and it is going to be protected, and it is going to be helped, and it is going to be shored up, and that is all I ask.

The only other thing is that I am not one who delegates my functions. I have always said, and I do not mean this to be disrespectful, that staffs are to be on tap and not on top. And that is it because we are elected, and we are the ones that should make the judgment decisions and be accountable for them.

So with this tremendous help of this very good staff then available we were able to designate two who are expert in this area of the savings and loan industry and particularly the FSLIC or the insurance fund. I had them visit several of the regions of the Home Loan Bank Board. We came back, and, after the hearing with the Chairman of the Board we announced hearings in San Francisco, which we held last Thursday, the 12th, and Friday, the 13th, and those were most fruitful hearings. We had excellent hearings. We have a great debt of gratitude to the little lady who is a member of our committee that represents that area in San Francisco, the gentlewoman from California [Ms. PELOSI] who is a member and very valued member of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs. Even though this is her second term, she has just literally shone out. She has come aboard, as we say here, running.

Mr. Speaker, we had very productive hearings that will be helpful to the membership of the committee. We will have a hearing next week, at which time the Chairman of the Home Loan Bank Board, Mr. Greenspan, has agreed to come before us. We will have other witnesses from various sectors, private industry sector and governmental or regulatory sector. Then on the 7th and 8th of February, God willing, we intend to have comprehensive hearings on the so-called leveraged buyouts. Also we have concomitant, or we have corollary activities that are equally worrisome such as hostile takeovers of one bank by another bank. That is unprecedented, and the Federal Reserve Board announced yesterday some momentous decisions in allowing banks to get into the dangerous thing that has had our country involved in a frenetic, what I call money mania, and that is the exchange, the corporate exchange of equity for debt.

Mr. Speaker, yesterday's decision I have protested and made a statement with respect to that, and I have written a letter to the Reserve Board. But they made that decision. I feel that it improperly invades the jurisdiction of the policymaking body, which is the Congress. It is unprecedented. It is a very fateful decision even though some parts of it are sort of in suspense for about a year or so.

The other thing is that we have the question, continuing question, of bank powers or deregulation. There my basic conviction is that just as much time, and debate and consideration as it took to impose the regulation the Congress should take in removing or reregulating. This is a reason why in 1971, when our committee got the demand from the administration then, President Nixon's administration, and the Secretary of the Treasury, my fellow Texan and former Governor, Mr. Connally, that we approve, sight unseen and without the change of a comma, the so-called Economic Stabilization Act. Well, that is a fancy word for wage and price controls. Well, it was I, this liberal, who resisted it to the end. And I did all I could to obstruct. Why? Because there was no comprehensive plan as to administration or accountability. I had an amendment that would have provided the President to report to the Congress every 90 days as to the progress or lack thereof of the wage and price control system. Would not consider it. In fact I was denounced for even thinking of it.

Then I said, "What? You don't have any plans as to how you will remove the control?"

Mr. Speaker, that is the reason why I think we have these aberrations and continue to have what a few years ago was called stagflation. Well, we still have it. I know the boast is by those in power that inflation has been reduced and been controlled. I have a hard time convincing my constituents that they are paying less for light, gas and water because they know they are paying five times more. I have a hard time convincing my constituents that they have deflation at the grocery store because they are paying more for groceries. They are not paying less. I have a hard time convincing them that their salaries have not been deflated because they have.

Mr. Speaker, in the last 5 years every year we have had a steady, no less than 6-percent decline in the net median average earnings in America while at the same time the basic cost of living has not been deflated. I think it is preposterous to try to fool the people with this high-flown oratorical and skillfully rhetorically phrased pretension that we have, particularly when interest rates—there is the real booger.

Mr. Speaker, interest rates are still not stabilized, and that has been at the bottom of the cause. But that is another subject matter.

Eventually I hope we can lead the committee because I am speaking as one. I am speaking only as chairman. I have outlined what, thus far, I have charted. We hope to have our first organizational meeting; that is, to organize the subcommittees and the like, next week on Wednesday, and the final and second organizational meeting the week following, on February 1. Then we will proceed along the lines of subcommittee activity and sharing the jurisdiction of the matters confronting us with the pertinent subcommittees that have been constructed.

Mr. Speaker, we have been very fortunate. I consider that the members on our committee on both sides are some of the outstanding minds and prepared legislators that anybody could hope to have serve them, and so with that we will march forward. In the meanwhile I have met with the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Brady, and his assistants. I have met with the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, Mr. Greenspan. I have met with the Chairman of the FDIC, Mr. Seidman, and I have met, as well, several times with Mr. Wall, the Chairman of the Home Loan Bank Board. Mostly those meetings were on my solicitation to present my credentials, so to speak, but also to elicit to the max power a cooperative spirit. The problems confronting us in this area are monumental.

They are unprecedented in three decades at least, maybe four. We have got to be united and even every one of us working in unison with the best of good will, will have a tough time to confront and face and overcome the challenges that we face in the Committee on Banking and other committees and in the Congress as a whole; but as I say and repeat, God willing and in good faith and in unity, essential unity, we will again triumph.

I think that the stakes are so high, particularly in that area that I discussed briefly having to do with the international and the forces outside our shores that now impact us in a way over which we have no control, to the point where perhaps even our basic institutions cannot even themselves control such things as interest rates.

BILL TO RESTORE COASTAL REVIEW POWERS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, today I am reintroducing an important bill which I sponsored in the 100th Congress. I am pleased that Congressman ANDY IRELAND is joining me again, as an original cosponsor.

The bill is identical to H.R. 3202 from the 100th Congress. The House Subcommittee on Oceanography held hearings on the bill during the 100th Congress, and approved the bill for full committee consideration. (In addition, the Senate Commerce Committee held hearings on a similar bill introduced by Senator HOLLINGS.)

The purpose of this bill is simple: it will restore to the States the right to review Federal activities which affect their coastal zones for consistency with their State coastal zone management plans, regardless of whether those activities actually take place in the coastal zone. This right was taken away from the States in a 1984 Supreme Court decision.

Restoration of this right is particularly important with respect to offshore oil drilling proposals because it would ensure that States have a say at an early stage in the leasing process. This, in turn, would ensure that the Interior Department (and oil companies) understand State concerns about the impact of drilling on particular areas and would, hopefully, lead to the deletion of sensitive areas before a lease sale takes place. This would help to minimize conflict and litigation later on, to the benefit of States, the Federal Government, oil companies and, of course, the marine environment.

As I noted above, this bill would restore the full Federal-State relationship which was envisioned by the drafters of the Coastal Zone Management Act. That statute was intended to provide for a true partnership under which States are given the opportunity to review Federal activities and federally permitted activities which affect the coastal zone for consistency with approved State coastal management plans, if the States develop an approved coastal management plan. This simple, but important, relationship balances Federal interests with State interests, and helps to ensure that needed projects can go forward if they comply with State coastal protection standards.

The Supreme Court's 5 to 4 ruling that Federal oil and gas lease sales on the Outer Continental Shelf were not subject to consistency review disrupted that balance. It ended the States' ability to review Federal oil and gas lease sales, and it raised serious concerns about whether other Federal activities might also be found, by later courts, also to be exempt from consistency reviews.

This legislation will ensure that States are not stripped of their power to review Federal activities which significantly affect the natural resources or land or water uses in the coastal zone.

Let me make a few other important points with regard to this issue. First, this measure represents an effort merely to restore the original intent of the Coastal Zone Management Act, not an effort to extend that statute beyond its original scope. Section 307(c)(1) of the statute, by its very words, makes it clear that Federal activities "directly affecting" the coastal zone are, in fact, subject to consistency review. It makes no reference to the location of those activities; instead, the exercise of State review is dependent upon the effect of the Federal activity. This bill would restore the original intent of Congress that the effects, rather than the location, of the activity, should determine the applicability of the State consistency review provisions of section 307(c)(1).

A second important point is that State review of Federal oil and gas lease sales would not give States a "veto" power over such sales, as some opponents may claim. Even if a State disagreed with the Federal agency's determination, the lease sale would go forward unless the parties agreed to submit to mediation by the Secretary of Commerce or unless the State succeeded in persuading a court to overturn the Federal agency's action. Hopefully, the possibility of litigation would encourage the parties to resolve their differences through negotiation or mediation. There is simply no State "veto" power over Federal activities.

A third key point is that this legislation has significance beyond OCS oil and gas lease sales. What it involves is the clarification of how we determine whether any Federal activity is subject to State consistency review. As I have noted, this legislation specifies that the test, again, is whether the Federal activity has a "significant" effect on the coastal zone, not whether the activity is located within the coastal zone. Although I believe that clarification of the power of States to review Federal oil and gas lease sales is important enough, taken alone, to justify this measure, we must not forget that many other Federal activities, some of which may take place outside the coastal zone, can also cause direct or significant effects on the coastal zone. Unfortunately, several Federal agencies have argued that the decision in Secretary of Interior versus California prohibits State review of other Federal activities and federally permitted activities outside the coastal zone. If we do not adopt legislation such as that being introduced today, our States may eventually lose all of their ability to protect their coastal resources from harm caused by Federal activities outside the coastal zone. If that happens, we will be very close to having entirely eviscerated the Coastal Zone Management Act.

As I noted above, I believe that early involvement of States in reviewing Federal activities, especially oil and gas lease sales, is beneficial to all parties involved. The benefits of State consistency reviews of OCS lease sales were eloquently summarized by Justice Stevens. In his dissenting opinion in Secretary of Interior versus California, he explained that:

The sale of OCS leases involves the expenditure of millions of dollars. If exploration and development cannot be squared with the requirements of the CZMA, it would be in everyone's interest to determine that as early as possible. On the other hand, if exploration and development of the tracts would be consistent with the state management plan, a pre-leasing consistency determination would provide assurances to prospective purchasers and hence enhance the value of the tracts to the Federal Government and, concomitantly, the public. Advance planning can only minimize the risk of either loss or inconsistency that may ultimately confront all interested parties.

It is my hope that the importance and wisdom of allowing States to review Federal activities which directly affect their coastal zones will be as obvious to my colleagues as it was to Justice Stevens.

I urge my colleagues to join me and Congressman IRELAND in supporting this important measure.

The following is the text of the bill:

A bill to amend the Coastal Zone Management Act of 1972 regarding activities directly affecting the coastal zone

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 307(c)(1) of the Coastal Zone Management Act of 1972 (16 U.S.C. 1456(c)(1)) is amended to read as follows:

"(c)(1)(A) Each Federal agency conducting or supporting an activity that directly affects the coastal zone shall conduct or support that activity in a manner which is fully consistent with the enforceable, mandatory policies of approved State mangement programs, unless—

"(i) the conduct or support of the activity in that manner is prohibited by applicable Federal law; or

"(ii) a circumstance arising after a management program (or an amendment thereto) is approved, and unforeseen at the time of such approval, presents a substantial obstacle to the achievement by the agency of full consistency in conducting or supporting the activity.

In the event that achievement by a Federal agency of full consistency is prevented pursuant to clause (i) or (ii), the agency may deviate from full consistency only to the extent justified by clause (i) or (ii).

"(B) For purposes of subparagraph A, a Federal agency activity shall be treated as one that "directly affects the coastal zone' if the activity—

"(i) is within the coastal zone, on Federal lands excluded from the coastal zone under section 304(1), landward of the coastal zone, or seaward of the coastal zone, including oil and gas and mineral lease sale activities on the Outer Continental Shelf and the sale, transfer or lease of other Federal lands; and

"(ii) produces or may produce significant effects on any land or water use or natural resource of the coastal zone.".

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

THE NATURAL GAS TRANSITION ACT OF 1988

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Natural Gas Transition Act of 1989. This legislation addresses an important problem—the growing trend of natural gas bypasses of local utilities by large gas users. Because of the significant effects that bypasses have on local ratemaking, my bill is designed to give State and local commissions the choice of deciding whether a bypass is or is not in the best interests of a majority of all ratepayers. A detailed description follows:

EXPLANATION

The purpose of this Act is to limit the power of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC or Commission) to permit new natural gas service which would displace or "bypass" local public utility service to end use customers. As such, it would function as an overlay to the Natural Gas Act (NGA) and the Natural Gas Policy Act (NGPA), without specifically amending either statute. The Act explicitly recognizes and clarifies the role of the state and local utility regulatory agencies in this area of essentially local concern and provides specific procedures under which proposed service that would bypass local utilities must be evaluated by FERC before any approval may be granted or any blanket authorization may be relied upon to perform the bypass service.

Until recently, the Commission's long-held policy was to prefer that natural gas service to end users be provided by their local distribution companies (LDCs), which are regulated as public utilities. See, e.g., Panhandle Eastern Pipeline Co., 36 FPC 1107 (1966); Missouri Edison Co., 47 FPC 849 (1972); Southern Natural Gas Co., 25 FPC 925 (1961); and American Louisiana Pipe Line Co., et al., 20 FPC 575 (1958). Of the many rationales underlying this policy, the most important consideration was the extent to which the loss of large industrial customers of the LDC economically and operationally impacts its remaining customers.

Recent federal policies deregulating wellhead prices and providing for "open access" transportation, however, have restructured the way gas is bought and sold in the interestate marketplace. In furtherance of its new policy to encourage competition in the natural gas industry, the Commission has shifted its focus of public interest considerations away from the long-term rate consequences on residential customers of the LDC and onto the short-term economic benefits realized by the industrial customer. See, e.g., Kansas Power & Light Co. v. Williams Natural Gas Co., 45 FERC ¶ 61,272 (1988); American Distribution Co. (Alabama Div.), 37 FERC ¶ 61,282 (1986); Panhandle Eastern Pipe Line Co., (Hayes Albion), 29 FERC ¶ 61,338 (1984).

Similarly, in a series of recent orders, FERC has substantially broadened the availability of interstate pipeline transportation service that is not subject to any public interest regulatory review. Under Section 311(a) of the NGPA, FERC is authorized to permit interstate pipeline transportation service "on behalf of" LDCs and intrastate pipelines that is free of FERC's NGA jurisdiction. In Hadson Gas Systems, Inc., 44 FERC ¶ 61,082 (1988), appeal pending, Associated Gas Distributors, et al. v. FERC, D.C. Cir. No. 88-1856, FERC interpreted this statutory provision in such a manner as to open non-NGA jurisdictional transportation to virtually all shippers, including parties bypassing local utilities. See also Cascade Natural Gas Corp. v. Northwest Pipeline Corp., 44 FERC ¶61,081 (1988), appeal pending, Associated Gas Distributors, et al. v. FERC, D.C. Cir. No. 88-1857. Thus, under color of NGPA section 311(a), as currently interpreted by FERC, parties may construct new facilities and accomplish a bypass of an LDC with virtually no federal regulatory review of public interest considerations.

The Commission's campaign to relax market entry in the name of competition is at the same time highly disruptive of traditional public utility service and the local regulatory responsibilities of the States. It imposes huge economic costs upon those consumers who must continue to rely on the local utilities for service—economic costs that may well exceed any benefits realized by the pipelines and end users seeking to bypass.

The regulatory authority that is clearly best situated to review the costs and benefits of a proposed bypass is the state or local commission with jurisdiction over the affected public utility. That regulatory body is responsible for setting the rates and terms of utility service to all classes of gas consumers in the utility's service area. Yet, in the context of the most common form of bypass undertaken today—in which the pipeline provides a direct transportation-only service to the end user—the ability of state and local regulatory authorities to review proposed bypass service has been questioned. In National Steel Corp. v. Long, 689 F. Supp. 729 (W.D. Mich. 1988), appeal pending, Michigan Consolidated Gas Co. v. Panhandle Eastern Pipeline Co., 6th Cir. No. 88-1650, a federal district court determined that, despite the "substantial local interests at stake" in a bypass case, the Michigan Public Service Commission's regulatory authority was preempted by a FERC decision to authorize an interstate pipeline bypass of a Michigan distributor by means of a transportation-only service. The court explicitly noted, in conclusion, that if federal preemption results in inadequate protection of the important local interests at stake in a bypass case, "then it is for Congress to fashion an appropriate remedy." Id. at 738.

Importantly, this Act does not protect LDCs from the threat of bypass in all instances. Nor is it intended to insulate distributors from the pressures of a more competitive marketplace for natural gas. Rather, it achieves a blend of (1) encouraging competition for natural gas supply itself, which furthers the Congressional policy of wellhead competition established in the NGPA and (2) recognizing the primacy of state and local interests in retaining a regulated monopoly in the provision of local natural gas distribution service.

SECTION-BY-SECTION SUMMARY

Section 1

This section designates the title of the Act as the Natural Gas Transition Act of 1989. The reference to "transition" recognizes the fact that the natural gas industry is moving to a more competitive, less regulated environment, and this Act is intended to protect the interests of consumers of gas nationwide during that transition.

Section 2

This section, entitled "Bypass Restraint", consists of four parts. The first, Subsection (a), provides new limits on the Commission's authority, pursuant to either the NGA or the NGPA, to authorize a new service where that service would displace service which is being provided or which could be provided by an LDC. Subsection (a) also provides a new legal standard under which FERC must evaluate proposals for such service.

The second part of Section 2, Subsection (b), creates a prior public notice requirement for any proposed service that would bypass an LDC. The third part, Subsection (c), defines the term "local distribution company" for purposes of this Act. Finally, Subsection (d) provides for immediate effectiveness of the Act upon enactment, and further clarifies the universe of services to which it applies.

Subsection 2(a)

The first subsection of Section 2 is cast in prohibitory language. It states that the Commission may not, by either certificate, rule, or order, permit any interstate natural gas service (i.e., service authorized pursuant to the NGA or the NGPA) that would displace service offered by an LDC in the event of either of two occurrences. One relates to actions taken by the state or local regulatory authority, and the other is triggered by the local utility threatened with the bypass itself.

State/Local Commission Certification. The first situation in which bypass is prohibited, Paragraph (a)(1), is where the state or local regulatory authority that has jurisdiction over the "affected" LDC certifies to FERC that the proposed service would prejudice the present or future interest of the remaining customers of that utility.

The reference to "state or local" authority parallels the term "state commission" as such is defined in NGA Section 2(8), see 15 U.S.C. § 717a(8) (1982). The NGA definition of "state commission" is "the regulatory body of the state or municipality having jurisdiction to regulate rates and charges for the sale of natural gas to consumers within the state or municipality." Likewise, the referenced term is meant to include both state regulatory commissions, the most common regulator of local distribution companies, as well as other local regulatory bodies, such as municipal authorities, which have comparable jurisdiction to state authorities.

The concept of a local commission "certifying" to the federal Commission its determination—which certification is to be treated by FERC as conclusive—is also found in the NGA. The "Hinshaw exemption" in NGA Section 1(c) states that certain interstate activities are exempt from FERC jurisdiction if, among other things, the entity performing those activities is subject to state regulation. The exemption language states that "[a] certification from such State commission to the Federal Power Commission . . . shall constitute conclusive evidence of such regulatory power or jurisdiction."

The term "affected local distribution company" means the LDC that is currently providing, or that could otherwise provide, service to the end user; in other words, the LDC that would be bypassed. Note also that "local distribution company" is defined later in the statute, at Subsection 2(c).

This provision is intended to recognize the essentially local nature of natural gas utility bypass issues. Generally, large industrial end users of gas seek to bypass their local utilities when they are dissatisfied with the rates and/or other terms of service that the utility can provide. As noted above, those rates and terms of service are subject to the regulatory authority of the state or local commissions that have jurisdiction over the LDCs. These commissions are charged with balancing the needs of the utility as a business enterprise with the broader, public interest of all of its customers, residential and commercial as well as industrial, in secure, long-term service at reasonable rates. It is well recognized that a utility's loss of customers due to bypass by an interstate or intrastate pipeline may have a tremendously adverse impact on the remaining customers of the utility.

As the U.S. Supreme Court has recognized with respect to sales of natural gas, the attempt by an interstate pipeline to "compete for the cream of the [LDC's] volume business without regard to the local public convenience and necessity" is a matter of "'essentially local' concern and of vital interest to" the affected State itself. Panhandle Eastern Pipe Line Co. v. Michigan Public Service Comm'n, 341 U.S. 329, 373-74 (1951). At present, the States are able to protect these essentially local concerns by asserting jurisdiction over bypasses that are accomplished by means of a direct sale by the interstate pipeline to the industrial end user. Where that pipeline performs a bypass by means of direct transportation, however, and the sale takes place between the end user and some third party, FERC has asserted that the State has no jurisdiction over the pipeline's bypass service. See Panhandle Eastern Pipe Line Co., 42 FERC ¶61,076, 61,349 (1988), appeal pending, Michigan Consolidated Gas Co. v. FERC, D.C. Cir. No. 88-1062. This assertion of preemptive federal jurisdiction, moreover, has been upheld by a federal district court in the National Steel case discussed above.

Thus, the language of Paragraph 2(a)(1) resolves an apparent inconsistency in the NGA statutory language, as currently interpreted, by placing an appropriate level of authority over proposals to bypass LDCs where it rightfully belongs—in the hands of the local or state regulatory authority. If this body determines that the bypass should not take place given the resultant detriment to the remaining customers of the affected LDC, and certifies so to the Commission, then the bypass may not occur.

It should also be noted that the Act does not dictate or in any way foreclose the procedures to be undertaken at the state level in advance of a state or local commission's certification of the effects of a proposed bypass arrangement. It simply shifts the forum for consideration of the relevant public interest issues in the first instance from the federal to the state level. Thus, an industrial end user that believes a bypass of its local public utility for direct pipeline service would be justified and in the public interest should make its arguments to the local regulatory authorities.

Local Distribution Company Protest. The second occurrence under which the Act prohibits a new bypass service to be undertaken is set forth in Paragraph 2(a)(2). This is where the affected LDC protests the proposed bypass (after receiving advance notice of such proposal, as required in Subsection 2(b) described below) and the would-be bypasser is unable to demonstrate, in a hearing proceeding at FERC, that that LDC is not willing to provide transportation service on terms and conditions that are "in effect, or accepted or approved by" the LDC's state or local regulatory authority. Stated differently, if the affected LDC files a protest at FERC, then the Commission must order an evidentiary hearing. The required procedure is characterized in the Act as a hearing "on the record" which, under the Administrative Procedure Act, means a formal proceeding with adequate opportunity both to present evidence and argument and to meet the presentation of opposing evidence and argument. 5 U.S.C. §§ 554 and 556 (1982). At the hearing, the proponent of the bypass (most likely an interstate or intrastate pipeline) bears the burden of proving that the affected distributor is not willing to transport gas to the end user.

The significance of the determination whether the affected LDC is willing to provide transportation service is grounded in competition considerations. As noted above, during the past several years, the natural gas industry has undergone a dramatic metamorphosis from its traditional structure based on sales (from producer to pipeline, pipeline to distributor, and distributor to end user) to a more flexible national market based on transportation. See generally, Associated Gas Distributors v. FERC, 824 F.2d 981 (D.C. Cir. 1987), cert denied, 108 S. Ct. 1468 (1988); Maryland Peoples' Counsel v. FERC, 761 F.2d 768 (D.C. Cir. 1985); Maryland Peoples' Counsel v. FERC, 761 F.2d 780 (D.C. Cir. 1985). Many non-traditional sellers of gas now compete for sales, both at the retail and wholesale levels, and rely on transportation by one or more other parties to deliver the gas. To take a concrete example, where an end user in New England traditionally had but a single natural gas supplier—its local public utility—it now may contract for the purchase of gas from a producer located in the Southwest or a marketer headquartered in Chicago, so long as it can arrange for transportation of the gas to its facilities.

At the federal level, the Commission has been aggressively promoting the opening, by interstate pipelines, of access to transmission (as distinct from sales) capacity. See, e.g., Order No. 436, Regulation of Natural Gas Pipelines After Partial Wellhead Decontrol, FERC Stats. & Regs. (Regulations and Preambles). ¶30,665 (Oct. 9, 1985), vacated and remanded, Associated Gas Distributors v. FERC, supra, repromulgated in relevant part, Order No. 500, III FERC ¶30,761 (Aug. 7, 1987), appeal pending, American Gas Ass'n v. FERC, D.C. Cir. No. 87-1588. Several States have followed suit, either with "mini-Order No. 436" open access programs (e.g., Wisconsin, New Mexico), generic transportation rate design guidelines (e.g., Virginia, California), or even stronger mandates to their LDCs to offer transportation (e.g., Kansas, Michigan, Pennsylvania, Maryland). In other States, however, LDCs may still retain substantial discretion to decide whether, and on what terms, to provide transportation services for their end-use customers.

The requirement that an LDC must be willing to provide transportation for its end users, in order to satisfy the statutory inquiry in Paragraph 2(a)(2) and thereby prevent a bypass, is a strong incentive for LDCs to offer such service. By doing so, they provide their end users with competitive alternatives to the LDCs' own sales gas. This, in itself, may eliminate many end-users' incentives to seek a bypass arrangement in order to gain access to lower-priced supplies of gas. For those end users served by "recalcitrant" distributors who refuse to offer them access to transportation as well as sales service, the option of bypass remains viable under the statute.

It should also be noted that, with respect to bypass services proposed under NGA Section 7(c), the evidentiary test of whether the affected LDC is willing to provide transportation service is in no way intended as a replacement for the statutory Section 7 requirement that the proposed service be found to be in the "present or future public convenience and necessity." In other words, if the pipeline cannot meet its burden of proof with respect to availability of LDC transportation, then the certificate cannot be issued. If, however, a pipeline meets its evidentiary burden, then the Commission is still statutorily obligated, under NGA Section 7, to determine that the proposed bypass would serve the public convenience and necessity before a certificate may be issued authorizing the service.

This subsection of the "Bypass Restraint" provision states that in no event may the Commission authorize a bypass service by certificate, rule, or order until 30 days after it has published a notice of same in the Federal Register. The purpose of this requirement is to insure that the affected state or local regulatory commissions, LDCs and other interested parties have prior notice of the proposed bypass service and, moreover, that they have an adequate opportunity to prepare and file a certification (in the case of a state or local commission acting under Paragraph 2(a)(1)) or a protest.

This prior notice provision is particularly important given that the Commission currently authorizes self-implementing transactions under both NGPA Section 311 and so-called "blanket" certificates pursuant to NGA Section 7. Once it has obtained a blanket authorization, in many cases a pipeline may begin service without seeking any further approvals. FERC regulations authorize new transportation, undertaken pursuant to a blanket certificate, for up to a 120-day period with no prior notice whatsoever. 18 C.F.R. § 284.223(a)(1) (1988). With respect to transportation undertaken pursuant to NGPA Section 311 that would bypass an LDC, regulations require the pipeline merely to certify that before transportation commenced, it gave written notice to the LDC and its state or local commission. 18 C.F.R. §§ 284.106(a)(4) and 284.126(a)(6).

Only long-term transportation for a shipper other than an interstate pipeline requires not only prior notice, but an opportunity for interested parties to protest and obtain a hearing. 18 C.F.R. §§ 284.223(b) and 157.205. The statutory requirement in Subsection 2(b) will provide the opportunity for protest and a hearing in all cases of proposed bypass.

It should also be noted that this subsection modifies existing "blanket" authorizations by requiring, at the very least, the specified notice and protest period before commencement of a new service that involves the bypass of an LDC. For additional discussion about the impact of this statute upon pre-existing authorizations, see Section 2(d) below.

Subsection 2(c)

This subsection provides a statutory definition of the term "local distribution company." As it is used in the Act, LDCs are those companies which are (1) "engaged in the distribution of natural gas for consumption," and (2) "regulated or operated as a public utility by a state or local government or agency thereof."

This definition is slightly different from the definition of LDC that appears in Section 2(17) of the NGPA. 15 U.S.C. § 3301(17) (1982). The reason for this is to bring within the definition of LDC those companies that are clearly engaged in the local distribution of gas and are regulated by state or local regulatory authorities, but whose facilities also happen to be located in more than one State. By vitue of their "interstate" facilities, those companies are considered by FERC to be interstate pipelines. Though they may fall under a special exemption from federal certification requirements pursuant to NGA Section 7(f), they are also technically excluded from the NGPA definition of an LDC. As state-regulated local public utilities, however, they are subject to the same regulatory responsibilities as other LDC's. As such, they are equally vulnerable to the threat of bypass and equally deserving of the protections provided under this Act.

This subsection provides for immediate effectiveness of the Act upon its date of enactment. It also specifies that the provisions of the Act, including the Subsection 2(a) bypass prohibitions and procedures, shall apply to all new services (i.e., service not previously provided), whether they require a new approval from the Commission or can be undertaken pursuant to existing (i.e., NGPA Section 311 self-implementing or NGA Section 7 blanket certificate) authority.

Importantly, the Act does not reach back retroactively to affect a bypass arrangement that is currently in operation. Thus, no services for which facilities have already been constructed and for which service has commenced will be jeopardized or subject to additional regulatory scrutiny by virtue of this Act. Rather, only new bypass arrangements will be subject to the greater scrutiny and procedural protections of Subsections 2(a) and (b).

A TRIBUTE TO EDNA CRISMAN ON THE OCCASION OF HER 100TH BIRTHDAY CELEBRATION

HON. MARCY KAPTUR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, in ancient traditions, a long and prosperous life was a sign of a life lived well and to the benefit of others. Ohio's Ninth District, while far from ancient, has benefited from just such an individual's life. I welcome this opportunity to pay tribute to a truly great woman whose exceptional dedication and zeal has distinguished her as a hallmark of hospitality and good will to the community of Delta, OH. A woman known and loved by generations of families throughout northwest Ohio, Mrs. Edna Crisman celebrated her 100th birthday with friends and admirers following the Veterans Day Parade in her hometown of Delta on November 11, 1888.

Known to many as the "Queen of Delta," Mrs. Crisman has been an active leader in a wide variety of civic, religious, and political activities throughout her many years. Born in Bryan, OH on November 11, 1988, Mrs. Crisman distinguished herself early-on as a young woman of exceptional determination and talent. She attended Ohio University for a brief period, went on to teach public school in the town of Delta, and was a Sunday schoolteacher in her church for over 40 years. She was married on September 1, 1914 to her husband Marion—a marriage which lasted until her husband's death in 1959. When her husband's business began to suffer during the Depression, Mrs. Crisman decided to open a restaurant in her parents' former home in Delta to assist with family expenses. Appropriately known as "Hostess House," Mrs. Crisman's restaurant, still owned and operated by her, has become a cherished landmark of Fulton County. It is here that Mrs. Crisman has most distinguished herself as Delta's "Grand Lady" of hospitality. Her culinary know-how, in a home-style tradition which has few rivals to her expertise, continues to attract generations of families from cities and towns both near and far.

Mr. Speaker, the town of Delta, OH, and in fact all who have been touched by Mrs. Crisman's kind and gentle manner are continually reminded of an era in American life rich in family-oriented values, and abundant in communal good will to friend and stranger alike. Thank you Mrs. Edna Crisman for keeping alive what we so often overlook most in America's fast-paced and expanding culture. While Edna may be the city of Delta's beloved "Hostess," her warm and generous spirit has been a blessing and gift to us all. I know that my colleagues in the Congress join me today in wishing Mrs. Edna Crisman a very happy birthday and best wishes for many years to come.

TRIBUTE TO MARGARET "MEG" HERLIHY

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to remember a dear friend and a grand lady of western Massachusetts politics who passed away in late December, Margaret "Meg" Herlihy.

Meg was everyone's favorite. For 12 years she served her constituents as a Franklin County Commissioner. For 14 years before that, her husband Tom served in that same capacity until his untimely death.

Meg Herlihy personnified Franklin County, MA. She was never considered a Democrat or a Republican. She was considered a representative of the people. And no matter how partisan an issue might become, it was Meg Herlihy who always voted first and foremost for the people of Franklin County.

Meg's death leaves a huge void in Franklin County. Although she had decided against running for reelection last November, and would have stepped down this month, Meg will always be thought of as the consummate public servant. She gave of herself more than anyone could ever ask.

She will be missed as a friend, as a person, and as a county commissioner. My wife Corinne's and my prayers are with her and her family during this diffucult time.

Mr. Speaker, a newspaper in Franklin County, the Greenfield Recorder, wrote an outstanding editorial honoring Margaret H. Herlihy. Following is the text of that eulogy:

[From the Greenfield (MA) Recorder, Jan. 4, 1989]

MEG HERLIHY

Public service, particularly at the county level, is not an especially rewarding activity. It takes a great deal of time, a high degree of commitment and a willingness to put up with problems that range from the petty to the peculiar to the pressing.

Margaret "Meg" Herlihy, who died unexpectedly last Friday, served her fellow Franklin County residents as a county commissioner for 12 years, and did so with style and charm. Today, had all gone according to plan, she would have been at the courthouse as a commissioner for the last time. She did not seek a fourth term in November's elections.

Her death, at age 69, shocked the community. Meg Herlihy was an active, outgoing, lively individual with a wealth of friends. In her 12 years as a county commissioner, she brought dignity and intelligence to the conduct of county business, as did her husband, Thomas, who served in the same position for 14 years prior to his equally unexpected death (it happened while he was playing tennis) in 1974.

Several years ago, Franklin County dedicated a county park in Whately to the memory of Tom Herlihy. Unfortunately, a chronic shortage of funds contributed to the general deterioration of the park, and it no longer serves the public. Perhaps Meg Herlihy's untimely death will prompt a search for a suitable way to permanently memorialize the contributions she and her husband made to the betterment of this community.

COMMEMORATING DR. LEON H. STEINBERG AS HADASSAH'S MAN OF DISTINCTION

HON. JAMES H. BILBRAY

OF NEVADA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. BILBRAY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to one of southern Nevada's most respected physicians, Dr. Leon H. Steinberg. On Saturday, January 28, the Las Vegas Chapter of Hadassah will honor this exceptional Las Vegan at their Annual Presidents Ball. He is truly deserving of this honor.

Born in Warsaw, Poland, Dr. Steinberg emigrated to the United States in 1938. He attained his U.S. citizenship in 1943 and later served in the Medical Corps of the U.S. Air Force from 1946–48. Dr. Steinberg went on to study at the University of Illinois where he received his B.S. degree in 1950 and his M.D. degree in 1954.

While in college, Dr. Steinberg received numerous awards and recognitions. He graduated with highest honors in chemistry and was admitted to the Phi Beta Kappa National Honor Society. While in medical school, he was member of Alpha Omega Alpha, the medical honorary fraternity.

Dr. Steinberg continued his education at the University of Illinois by focusing his studies on radiology. Upon completing his studies, he decided to come to Las Vegas to put his years of schooling into practice. In 1958 he founded the Sunrise Hospital Department of Radiology, where he was director until 1971. He was also codirector of the department of radiology at Valley Hospital from 1975–84. Dr. Steinberg has been in private practice since 1971.

Aside from his professional responsibilities, Dr. Steinberg has found time to actively participate in various community organizations. He is a member of the Shriners, Temple Beth Sholom, and Bnai Brith, as well as being active on the Jewish Federation Board. He and his wife, Faye, have also been blessed with five beautiful children, all of which are pursuing successful careers in various fields.

Mr. Speaker, by any standard—be it professional contribution or community involvement—Dr. Leon Steinberg represents the best southern Nevada has to offer. I ask my colleagues to join me today in commending Dr. Leon Steinberg for his well-deserved recognition as "Hadassah's Man of Distinction."

BLACKS SHOWED PROGRESS UNDER REAGAN

HON. GERALD B.H. SOLOMON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, in one of his last interviews as President, Ronald Reagan wondered if some of the self-appointed "spokesmen" for black Americans weren't more interested in their own power than in the welfare of their own people.

I have to wonder who Jesse Jackson is speaking for when he condemns the Reagan administration's record of concern for black Americans. He certainly can't be speaking for the 2½ million blacks added to the civilian labor force since 1980.

Let's set the record straight: Jesse Jackson may have the rhetoric and the attention of the media, but the Reagan administration has the facts.

In 1980, the black civilian labor force numbered 10,865,000. As George Bush moves into the White House, that number is 13,205,000.

Blacks, like all Americans have been the beneficiaries of the longest sustained peacetime prosperity in our history.

If Jesse Jackson is really concerned about the dignity of black Americans, he should acknowledge that the worst indignity is standing in an unemployment line. There are fewer blacks in those lines, thanks to the enlightened policies of Ronald Reagan, which George Bush was elected to continue.

Nothing would be more conducive to racial harmony in America than less demagoguery and more honesty.

LEGISLATION TO REPEAL MEDICARE CATASTROPHIC COVERAGE ACT OF 1988

HON. BOB STUMP

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing a bill that will repeal the Medicare Catastrophic Coverage Act of 1988.

This new law is far from what Medicare beneficiaries need or want in the way of long-term care. The controversial funding mechanism, and the lack of coverage for out-of-hospital long-term care, represent a costly expansion of Medicare without providing the coverage most elderly people desire—nursing home and home health care coverage.

We need to encourage the availability of affordable long-term care for our elderly. Repealing Public Law 100-360, is the only way to allow for reconsideration of other alternatives.

LEGISLATION REGARDING LOW-LEVEL RADIOACTIVE WASTE DISPOSAL

HON. RONALD D. COLEMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation involving an issue that perhaps many of my colleagues would rather not address but which in my opinion needs to be reconsidered—low-level radioactive waste disposal.

In 1982, Congress relegated to the States the authority to provide for the disposal of low-level radioactive waste generated within their borders. High-level nuclear waste was made the exclusive province of the Federal Government, and low-level waste was at that time left under the exclusive jurisdiction of the States. As generally understood, low-level waste includes medical supplies, protective clothing, and nuclear reactor sludges contaminated with radioactivity.

In the State of Texas, however, the process of selecting a site within the State's border has taken on a direction that I am sure Congress did not anticipate in 1982. The Texas Legislature provided for waste disposal within its borders by establishing the Texas Low-Level Radioactive Waste Disposal Authority in 1981, commonly known as the "Authority." This authority was commissioned to select, prepare, construct, operate, maintain, decommission, close and finance a disposal site for Texas low-level waste.

Subsequent to creating the authority, the Texas Legislature directed it to focus its siting on lands that were State-owned. In fact, in determining acceptable dump sites, the authority was ordered to give preference to publicly owned land. The adoption of this 1985 provision by the Texas Legislature was made along regional lines, and virtually guaranteed the eventual placement of the site somewhere on sparsely populated public land found in west Texas despite the fact that more geologically suitable sites may exist on privately owned land in east Texas. This directive resulted in the consideration of three separate tracts of land in Hudspeth County, a county of 2,500 residents, one of these tracts now being the leading candidate under consideration by the authority.

The decision on the part of the State of Texas to locate the dump site in this area, however, violates our national interests because it ignores a 1983 "Agreement on Cooperation for the Protection and Improvement of the Environment in the Border Area" with the Republic of Mexico. This executive agreement declared that an area of 60 miles on both sides of the border between the two countries should be an environmentally protected zone.

As of yet, Mexico has not been informed of this preliminary selection. During the most recent election in Mexico last fall, Mexican congressional candidates along the border campaigned against the potential location of a nuclear waste disposal site proximate to the Rio Grande, and it is also likely that the administration of the new President of Mexico will more aggressively oppose the Hudspeth County site.

Under principles of international environmental law, the potential of liability by the United States exists in the event of a failure of a site. The danger of this is particularly acute given the mountain front setting of the site, the likely shallow groundwater recharge of an international acquifer, the geological activity of the area and the direct surface water connection to the Rio Grande.

The proposed site in Hudspeth County, TX, and the dumping of these materials in our area would threaten not only our country's relationship with Mexico, but also two international acquifers, the Rio Grande River, the Guadalupe Mountains National Park, Lincoln National Forest, Big Bend under the National Park Service jurisdiction, and a wildlife sanctuary being operated near the Rio Grande. Finally, sites in the area have recently been listed in the National Register of Historic Places.

The site under primary consideration is located near Fort Hancock, TX, and is approximately 11 miles from the Rio Grande. In the State of Texas, this river serves not only as the international border between the United States and Mexico and is also used by thousands of people on both sides of the Rio Grande for irrigation, drinking and domestic consumption and livestock water. The potential for groundwater contamination from a leakage at the facility and the eventual seepage of this groundwater into the Rio Grande certainly could pose a problem for these communities.

The risk of failure is great because part of the radioactive wastes will have an active life of 350 years or more. No one can be sure of the changes that will occur over the next 350 or more years. In the case under consideration the site proposed on the Rio Grande is in an area of potential earthquakes as have occurred and is subject to destructive erosion by the torrential rains which occur in the area.

The bill I am introducing today honors our environmental agreement with Mexico by prohibiting the location of radioactive dump sites within 60 miles of the United States-Mexico border. Congress has already directed the National Park Service to conduct a study that assesses the adverse environmental consequences and damage that could result to NPS property as well as to archaeological sites in the area. As a matter of fact, NPS personnel are visiting the site today, and the report should be available late next month.

I look forward to reviewing the results of this study and to working with my colleagues in the appropriate committees in considering this proposed legislation.

REINTRODUCTION OF THE AIR TRAVEL RIGHTS FOR BLIND INDIVIDUALS ACT

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, today I am reintroducing legislation I introduced in the last Congress to protect the basic rights of blind individuals who travel by air. The bill, entitled the Air Travel Rights for Blind Individuals Act garnered 117 cosponsors last year and I am hopeful that this year this important legislative initiative will enjoy even more support.

The Federal Aviation Administration [FAA] is still considering whether it is necessary to issue regulations regarding existing row seating on aircraft. Having been directly involved in this issue for over 2 years, I believe that the FAA has a responsibility to issue regulations that will prevent airlines from unjustly discriminating against handicapped individuals. I have written to the FAA urging that they issue regulations and that they incorporate the intent of my legislation into these regulations.

Despite the fact that the FAA has conducted research on the evacuation of blind and other handicapped persons, these studies did not address the ability of blind passengers to operate an exit door. In fact, there is no empirical data showing that a blind passenger sitting in an exit row seat poses a safety threat to other passengers. Despite this, the airlines—with the apparent support of the FAA and Department of Transportation—continue to discriminate against blind persons.

While most people can understand an airline's legitimate concern over safety, one cannot understand or condone the callous, rude and condescending manner in which many airlines have treated blind passengers who happened to be assigned to an emergency exit row seat. Most airlines assume that blind passengers would be unable to open the door and exit the plane in an emergency. The airlines' misguided seating policies do not give them the right to treat blind passengers like criminals.

Some airlines have forcibly removed blind passengers from emergency exit row seats and had them arrested. However, they rarely—if ever—have forcibly removed drunk passengers from these same seats. In fact, many airlines continue to sell drinks to drunk passengers. Obviously a drunk person would have extreme difficulty pulling the handle and opening an exit door in an emergency. The sad truth is the airlines—like much of our society—continue to view blind persons as second class citizens, unable to function in the normal world.

Mr. Speaker, I am deeply concerned that the airlines will continue to use the veil of safety to perpetuate the myth that blind individuals cannot function in society and must be treated differently from other people. Action must be taken to ensure that blind passengers are no longer subjected to unjustified and humiliating discrimination.

My legislation simply states that airlines cannot restrict seating in aircraft because of blindness. It would leave the FAA and the airlines free to establish criteria for seating passengers in exit row seats, but they would have to establish a policy that is fair and does not arbitrarily discriminate against certain individuals.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation addresses a very serious problem and I would hope that the Congress would give it the close and expeditious consideration it deserves. I will be working very hard in the coming months to push this initiative forward and I am confident that working together we can devise a fair and just solution to this vexing problem. The full text of my bill is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

OSTERHOUT FREE LIBRARY MARKS CENTENNIAL

HON. PAUL E. KANJORSKI

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. KANJORSKI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to bring to the attention of my colleagues the centennial celebration of the Osterhout Free Library, located in Wilkes-Barre, PA.

The library was founded by Isaac Osterhout and opened its doors to the public on January 29, 1889; it is recognized as one of the first public libraries in northeastern Pennsylvania. In 1904, one of the first children's rooms in the country was opened as part of the Osterhout Free Library, inviting the children of the area to explore the fascinating world of reading.

In 1972, Hurricane Agnes almost destroyed the library, ruining over 69,000 books, photograph records, pamphlets, magazines, and newspapers. By May 1973, with the help of the community, the entire library was refurbished and reopened for public use.

Today the Osterhout Free Library serves as the headquarters for the Luzerne County Library System. It has in its collection over 300,000 books, audio records, video cassettes, and films. Over 100 works of art are on view. In 1983 alone, over 43,000 patrons utilized the library's resources. Programs are offered year-round to all levels from the infant to the adult.

Mr. Speaker, libraries serve to protect our culture, heritage, and knowledge; they act as vessels through which we pass our thoughts to later generations. In them, Benjamin Franklin, Aristotle, James Joyce, and countless others stay alive for our education and enjoyment. On this occasion, as we look back at the many contributions the Osterhout Library has made to the citizens of my district over the past 100 years, I can only hope that it continues to foster the seeds of learning and curiosity that are so vital to an educated, thinking America.

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to two respected and popular leaders of the San Fernando Valley, William and Lilly Rozay, who will be honored by the board of directors of Shaarey Zedek Synagogue for their dedication, devotion, and achievements on behalf of the community

Bill and Lilly were both born, raised, and educated in Russia and are survivors of the Holocaust. In 1947, the young married couple emigrated with their 10-month-old son, Samuel, to the United States. With hard work and much luck, Bill started a trucking business, and in little time the business grew and enabled them to become involved in community activities.

Bill and Lilly are a loving couple and are well known for their kind and thoughtful ways. Their exemplary leadership in humanitarian endeavors have been characterized by a deep commitment and a strong sense of idealism. Their religious commitment, visionary judgment, and personal effort have contributed greatly to the stature of Shaarey Zedek congregation and the San Fernando Valley Orthodox Jewish community.

Throughout their lives, Bill and Lilly have always shown a willingness and desire to give freely of their valuable time to aid organizations or causes important to their community. The numerous awards and honors earned by Bill and Lilly are a testimony to the untold number of people whose lives were touched and improved by their generosity and dedication.

CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO BERGEN COUNTY CLERK CARL R. HARTMANN ON HIS RETIREMENT

HON. ROBERT A. ROE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, it is with the greatest pride and admiration that I rise today to salute an outstanding public servant in my home State of New Jersey who recently retired after giving a lifetime of unswerving and dedicated public service to his community, State and Nation.

I am speaking of Carl R. Hartmann, a lifelong resident of Wallington, NJ, who retired at the end of last year after a combined three decades as Wallington Borough Clerk and Bergen County Clerk, and after a total of nearly four decades of continued exemplary service to his community. For all of his tireless efforts, Carl R. Hartmann will be honored for his innumerable contributions with a dinner on Friday, January 27, at the Cotillion in Garfield.

Mr. Speaker, I know that this event will attract scores of congressional, State and community leaders, as well as numerous colleagues and friends. I know, too, that this will be an especially proud evening for his distinguished family; his mother, the former Lena Marofski; his sons, Robert, a former mayor and councilman of Wallington and Mark, a member of the zoning board of adjustment; his wife, Dorothy, who is currently serving her third term on the Wallington Board of Health; his daughter, Karen, his daughters-in-law, Janet and Pamela; his son-in-law Paul Smith, and his two lovely grandchilden, Scott and Daniel. I also know that Carl will be thinking of his late father, the distinguished Karl Hartmann, who served as a Wallington Councilman for 15 years.

Carl R. Hartmann was born in Wallington and attended Wallington public schools and East Rutherford High School. He served in the U.S. Army during World War II, and also served 3 years in the New Jersey National Guard. He began his long tenure of public service to his great community in 1951 when he was first elected to serve on the Wallington Borough Council, a position he held for 3 years.

In 1957 he became the Wallington Borough Clerk and served in that capacity for 16 years, until 1974 when he became the clerk of Bergen County, a position in which he greatly distinguished himself for 15 years before retiring at the end of last year. Mr. Speaker, it was during this period that Bergen County, NJ, sitting at the hub of the greater northern New Jersey-New York metropolitan area, grew by leaps and bounds into the bustling and prosperous area that it is today with a population in excess of 1 million people. In response to this explosive growth, Carl R. Hartmann proved himself a true innovator.

Among other measures he took to meet the needs of his rapidly expanding county, he was the first county clerk in the State of New Jersey to institute evening hours so that busy county residents could conduct their business after working hours. He also computerized the county's realty division and the filing system for the Bergen County Court Division, and he facilitated residents' access to passport applications.

Along with his many outstanding professional accomplishments, Carl R. Hartmann also served as commander of the Pavlick-Koster Post No. 2640 Veterans of Foreign Wars; as a fireman with the Wallington Fire Department and a member of the Exempt Firemen's Association; as a member of the Wallington Emergency Squad; as a member of the Wallington Recreation Commission, and as president of the Wallington Planning Board.

Mr. Speaker, when we speak of public service, most certainly Carl R. Hartmann stands as the kind of role model we could all emulate. For it is dedicated people such as this outstanding individual who truly make our communities, our States, our Nation and our world, a better place to live. Mr. Speaker, I invite you and our colleagues to join me in saluting a dedicated public servant, in the truest sense of the word, Carl R. Hartmann of Wallington, NJ.

SUSAN KENDZIORA WAGES WAR ON "HIDDEN DISEASE"

HON. CARL D. PURSELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. PURSELL. Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to rise today to pay tribute to an outstanding individual from Michigan's Second Congressional District, Ms. Susan Kendziora, of Jackson. She has, for the last 2 years, been increasing the public's awareness and understanding of multiple sclerosis through Recreation and Education for Multiple Sclerosis [REMS], a Jackson organization concerned with helping MS victims and increasing the public's awareness of the disease.

As a member of the Labor, Health and Human Services, Education Appropriations Subcommittee, I have become familiar with multiple sclerosis and the pain and frustration it brings its victims and their families. There is no known cure for MS and no known way to prevent it.

Through the efforts of individuals like Susan Kendziora, the public is becoming increasingly aware of the disease and how its victims still have much to offer society.

The following article from the December 29, 1988 edition of the Jackson Citizen Patriot is an outstanding summary of Susan Kendziora's work for REMS and the positive results it brings. I encourage all my colleagues in the House of Representatives to read the article and join me in praising Ms. Kendziora and REMS for their important commitment to the war against multiple sclerosis.

[From the Jackson Citizen Patriot, Dec. 29, 1988]

JACKSON WOMAN WAGES WAR ON "HIDDEN DISEASE"

By David L. Dotson

Although several hundred thousand Americans suffer from multiple sclerosis and closely related disorders, the disease and its effects are largely unknown outside of their families.

Because the symptoms of multiple sclerosis are sometimes invisible, its victims often suffer from more than just the ravages of the disease. They, and their families, also face problems in their jobs from employers and co-workers.

For Susan Kendziora, personnel manager at Jacobson's Jackson store, increasing the public's awareness and understanding of multiple sclerosis is a major concern. For the past two years, Kendziora has been involved with Recreation and Education for Multiple Sclerosis, a Jackson organization concerned with helping its victims and increasing the public's awareness of the disease.

"There are so many people in Jackson that have MS it's unbelievable," she said.

Kendziora, 31, and her husband Jim, 40, got involved with REMS in 1986 after Jim was formally diagnosed as having multiple sclerosis. She was elected secretary-treasurer of REMS shortly after they began attending the group's monthly meetings, and her husband was elected president.

In recognition of her work with REMS, Kendziora was recently nominated by Jacobson's for the 1988 Fred Lazarus Jr. Memorial Award for Community Service, sponsored by the National Retail Merchants Association. Nominations, based on an employee's outstanding initiative in community service, recognize those who have "touched the lives of others in a meaningful way."

During her tenure as secretary-treasurer of REMS the group's membership has expanded 25 percent and its checking account has grown from $100 to $3,000. Money for the account comes from corporate sponsors and from the proceeds of the Page One (Bar) Invitational Golf Outing. The money is used to buy canes, walkers and wheelchairs for MS sufferers who can't afford them.

Kendziora recruits Jackson-area pharmacies, dentists and doctors to contribute to the fund. In return, the sponsors' names go on the monthly newsletter she has developed for REMS members. Members are urged to patronize the sponsors' offices and businesses.

"We tell our members, 'Use these places, please utilize these places,' " she said.

Kendziora also recruits speakers for the group's monthly meetings. The speakers include experts on multiple sclerosis, civil rights, and other issues of concern of MS victims and their families.

"Afterward we just sit around and talk . . . (and) find solutions to problems," she said. "A lot of it is just bringing people together. It's like going to an AA meeting; you're with people who understand."

Despite the growing number of people diagnosed with multiple sclerosis—recent developments have made it much easier to diagnose—awareness of its symptoms and effects is still not widespread, said Kendziora. So it's important for MS victims and their families to have a place where they can share their problems and concerns and vent their frustrations.

"They can talk about their feelings, their fears, their joys," said Kendziora.

Multiple sclerosis is a disease of the brain and spinal cord which interferes with the brain's ability to control functions such as seeing, walking and talking. It commonly affects adults between 20 and 40 years old. Most multiple sclerosis occurs in the earth's temperate zones between 40 and 60 degrees latitude in the northern and southern hemispheres, with fewer cases found closer to the equator.

Although scientists have determined that MS is not contagious and that is is not a mental illness, they have not been able to determine its cause. Nor do they know how to prevent or cure it.

MS symptoms can be mild or severe, from blurred or double-vision to general fatigue to weakness or paralysis of the arms and legs. But the symptoms come and go unpredictably, and that can make it extremely difficult to diagnose.

Kendziora's husband suffered his first MS episode in 1980—a mild attack limited to facial muscles—but then the problem went away for a few years. When the symptoms started up again, it took a long time before Jim was officially diagnosed with multiple sclerosis.

"We'd go to doctor after doctor after doctor," she said. "Nobody really knew what it was."

Jim Kendziora was an avid softball player, working in a job that required him to climb on scaffolding, before MS became a constant presence in his life. Now it takes most of his energy to put in a full day's work, and a 20-minute walk through a department store can "wipe him out for two days," Kendziora said.

At work Jim faced problems with colleagues and supervisors who didn't understand why he wasn't performing as well as he once had. Eventually, after he was diagnosed as having MS, he was switched to a position requiring less physical effort.

"They moved him to a desk job, because there's nothing wrong with his mind," said Kendziora. "But it took a while, and I don't want other people to go through that."

Detection of MS has become easier in recent years, but public awareness and understanding still has far to go. And because it's not a visible handicap, employers don't know how to deal with it. They often interpret MS fatigue as laziness on the employee's part. That lack of understanding has caused problems for many of REMS' 80 members, said Kendziora.

"A lot of them live in fear that they are going to be terminated," she said. "A lot have had to quit, or were forced to resign, or were intimidated into quitting."

The effects of multiple sclerosis aren't limited to those who suffer from the disease, said Kendziora. Spouses and other family members must take over responsibilities previously handled by the MS victim.

But MS sufferers, along with people with other handicaps, still have a lot to offer businesses and to society in general, she said. That's why she devotes what little free time she has to increasing public awareness of the disease.

"What's really the biggest thing for me right now," said Kendziora, "is to make people understand what MS is."

RETIREMENT OF REIGN GEORGE RIX

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor Mr. Reign George Rix, a long-time educator in the Westfield public schools who is retiring this January from his position as principal of the Westfield Middle School.

Throughout his career, Reign has shown continued dedication to students, to public education, and to the community of Westfield, MA. His tenure within the town's school system began as a teacher of English at Westfield High School, a position he held from 1966–73. Upon assuming the post of assistant principal of the Westfield High School in 1973, Reign has displayed his success as an administrator, extending his expertise and educational knowledge outside of the classroom. After 12 years, Reign was promoted to principal of the Westfield Middle School where he served from 1985 until his retirement this month.

All of Reign's colleagues are truly going to miss the presence of such a committed educator. But it will be the students themselves who will most regret the loss of Reign. Throughout his career, he has been involved in many student activities beyond academia. During his years as assistant principal, he successfully coached the track team.

Athletics, team comradeship, and extracurricular activities of all kinds are vital part of a well-rounded education, to which every educator should be devoted. I commend Reign for his appreciation of high school sports, and applaud his willingness to contribute many hours of his time to supporting and encouraging school spirit and personal growth.

Although his background in education has been extensive, beginning with a graduation from Westfield High School to a master's degree from Westfield State College, it is not just from the academic world that Reign has obtained his expertise, knowledge, and experience. His service in the U.S. Navy during the Korean war is certainly worthy of praise and honor. Never neglecting his concern for this country, Mr. Rix has found time to remain an active member of the American Legion Post 124 for over a quarter-century.

How far Reign's career has taken him, from those younger days of working tirelessly for the family business, the Rix Milk Co. Delivering milk to many Westfield schools, including Westfield High School, Reign never imagined that he would someday find himself serving as teacher and principal in his hometown.

With such a multifaceted career, Reign's prosperity is enhanced by a wonderful family. Reign has been married to Patricia Vedovelli Rix for 32 years and has been blessed with four children and three grandchildren. Reign will always cherish those family commitments which have been a source of strength over the years.

Mr. Speaker, I want to personally salute Mr. Reign Rix for success as an educator, an administrator, and a truly remarkable person. However, as much as I am glad to have been given this opportunity to speak on his behalf, the pleasure is somewhat lost in the knowledge that Reign will leave a void in the public school system of Westfield which will not be easily filled.

TAX DEDUCTIONS FOR HOME HEALTH CARE, ADULT DAY CARE AND RESPITE CARE FOR FAMILIES OF ALZHEIMER'S DISEASE VICTIMS

HON. OLYMPIA J. SNOWE

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, today, I am reintroducing legislation which gained broad support in the last Congress. This bill would provide tax deductions from gross income for individual taxpayers who maintain a household which includes a dependent who has Alzheimer's disease or a related disorder. This measure would allow deductions of expenses, other than medical, which are related to the home health care, adult day care and respite care of an Alzheimer's victim.

Since the first Alzheimer's bills were introduced in the 97th Congress, we have all grown more aware and knowledgeable about this disease and the impact it has on both the individual and the family. Indeed, in a report published by the Subcommittee on Human Services of the Select Committee on Aging, of which I am the ranking minority member, we discovered the extent to which families remain involved in the care of family members who suffer from Alzheimer's and other such diseases. Family care remains one of the most critical factors in preventing or delaying nursing home utilization. As discussed in a recent report published by the Office of Technology Assessment, caregivers of dementia victims spend more than 40 hours a week in direct personal care.

In the face of the continued and intense involvement of the family caregiver, services that provide respite from the ongoing pressures of care become essential in the caregiver's ability to support the Alzheimer's victim at home. Home heath care, adult day care, and long-term respite care all provide opportunities to free caregivers from their caregiving responsibilities. Most caregivers willingly provide care for dependent and frail elderly family members. Even so, the presence of these supportive services can be a crucial factor in continued caregiving activities.

Many families are trying to cope with the needs of a dependent older Alzheimer's victim with no financial or professional help. While we seek to provide Government programs for such victims, we should also provide some tax relief for those expenses related to their continued care in the home. Perhaps, by such action we can delay the institutionalization of dementia victims. Surely we can provide financial relief to their caregivers.

WHAT'S WRONG AND RIGHT WITH ELDERS' NEW HEALTH PLAN

HON. DAN ROSTENKOWSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call to the attention of all Members an article written by Stephen Chapman that appeared in today's edition of the Chicago Tribune. There is considerable controversy surrounding the financing of the Medicare catastrophic health care benefits which we enacted in the last Congress. I believe the financing for these benefits was appropriate, and Mr. Chapman presents sound and strong reasons justifying our decision.

WHAT'S WRONG AND RIGHT WITH ELDERS' NEW HEALTH PLAN

(By Stephen Chapman)

Right now members of Congress must feel like a dog who happily fetches his master's slippers and then gets kicked for drooling on them. Last year, in an effort to appease the elderly, lawmakers approved a program to cover catastrophic health care expenses. This year, as it begins to take effect, they find their generosity under attack by the people it was supposed to gratify.

This brings to mind Randolph Churchill's surgery for a benign tumor, which prompted complaints that doctors had removed the only part of his body that was not malignant. The catastrophic health care plan is generally defective. But what has provoked the greatest uproar is its best feature.

The criticism is aimed at the financing scheme. Instead of paying for this new coverage through the already crushing payroll tax, Congress insisted that the people who benefit from the program also cover the cost. Medicare recipients will pay a flat $4 a month, rising to $10.20 by 1993. They will also be subject to a 15 percent surcharge on their federal income taxes, rising to 28 percent by 1993.

Critics say it's the height of unfairness to tax the elderly for this benefit. "Making seniors pay for this is like saying that only people with children will pay school taxes and only veterans will pay for the cost of VA hospitals," says a spokesman for the National Committee to Preserve Social Security and Medicare.

Not hardly. It's merely a way of saying that the taxpayers' carrying capacity is not unlimited. Payroll tax rates have risen by 50 percent since 1972. To finance catastrophic coverage, they'd have to go still higher.

The elderly already get a great deal from Social Security and Medicare. The average recipient gets back nearly six times more in retirement benefits than he paid in as a worker. This year's retirees can expect to get three times more from Medicare hospital insurance than they've contributed. Most of these benefits have the additional charm of being tax-free.

Older Americans are typically better off financially than younger ones. So the issue is not whether the elderly should have to bear a special burden, but whether workers should be saddled with another burden to enrich those whose incomes exceed their own. As Rep. Bill Gradison (R., Ohio) put it, "The financing was not asking Peter to pay for Paul's benefits. We're asking Peter to pay for Peter's benefits, and that's apparently a revolutionary idea."

Congress decreed, however, that the elderly poor would be spared most of the cost. The thinking was that it doesn't make much sense to protect people against ruinous medical bills by taxing them into poverty. That means 60 percent of the elderly will be unaffected. Only the well-to-do face an increase in their tax bill. And why shouldn't they?

It would be a shame if Congress were to let the complaints force a retreat on the financing method. Insisting that any new benefits to retirees should be paid for by retirees was a welcome departure from Washington's customary indulgence of the senior citizen lobby. But it wouldn't be a shame if Congress were to junk the whole effort.

The main problem is that it offers little that wasn't available before, and at less cost. More than two-thirds of the elderly were already covered by private insurance. If it was essential to protect the others against "catastrophic" expenses, the government could have required them to buy coverage too.

It could have helped pay the cost through vouchers. Or it could have simply expanded Medicare's reliance on HMOs, which pay almost all hospitalization costs. Instead, it evicted a competitive private system and installed a government monopoly.

Senior citizens' groups, unfortunately, demand an even bigger federal role. They want Washington to cover nursing home care, which this program doesn't.

That would be an expensive mistake. The federal government, along with state and local agencies, already pays half of all nursing home costs through Medicaid coverage of the poor. Paying the rest would cost $20 billion a year—mainly to protect the estates of well-to-do patients. (The catastrophic bill makes it easier for those with dependents to qualify for Medicaid, so healthy spouses don't have to become poor to get help.)

Elderly Americans who aren't covered by Medicaid can already buy insurance for nursing home care. If they choose not to pay for it, there's no reason the rest of us should.

The unexpected reaction to the catastrophic health care law ought to make Congress look a lot more carefully before it jumps to channel any new benefits to retirees. Senior citizen groups are right to say it's a lousy program. They're wrong to say it would be a good one if someone else would pick up the tab.

THOUGHTS ON THE PAY RAISE

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, as expected, the President's recommendation to increase the salaries of Members of Congress and other Government officials has raised a storm of controversy. I was particularly impressed by Mike Royko's comments on this issue and I am happy to recommend his recent column to my colleagues:

[From the Chicago Tribune, Dec. 13, 1988]

CONGRESS PAY ISN'T A BALLPARK FIGURE

(By Mike Royko)

The most popular position to take on pay raises for congressmen is that we shouldn't give these political scoundrels one extra nickel.

As Patrick Buchanan, the conservative columnist, angrily put it while ranting about "Beltway Bandits":

"Currently, members of Congress receive $89,500 a year, five times what the average American earns."

That's an interesting statistic, but I'm not sure what it means.

I'm certain that Buchanan, with his speaking fees and TV shows, rakes in 30 or 40 times what the average American earns. He probably makes at least five or six times what the average congressman is paid.

Does that mean that Patrick Buchanan is a more valuable creature than 30 or 40 average Americans? Or five or six congressmen?

Possibly, although as fierce as Buchanan is, I wouldn't swap a good watchdog for him, and all a good dog costs is the price of table scraps.

Actually, I don't have any strong feelings against congressmen getting pay raises. I've known some congressmen who weren't worth $8.95 a year. Others would be a bargain at $895,000 a year. So maybe it balances out.

That's the problem with trying to decide who's worth how much.

In Chicago, a garbage collector makes about $25,000 a year, and a cop about $33,000.

Compare that to Sylvester Stallone, who took in $63 million over the last two years without emptying one smelly can or firing anything but blanks.

Is Stallone worth 910 cops and 1,240 garbage collectors? Or even one cop and one garbage collector?

Without garbage collectors and cops, we'd have disease and anarchy. Without Sylvester Stallone? Well, we'd still have Arnold Schwarzenegger, who made only $43 million in 1987-88.

Or consider Goose Gossage, who pitches for the Cubs. His employers paid him $1,235,000 for last summer's work. All Gossage did for that money was make Chicagoans unhappy.

It happens that I work for the same corporation that owns the Cubs. They paid me much less than they paid Gossage, although I probably made just as many Chicagoans unhappy as he did. For that matter, I've been making them unhappy since Gossage was a mere tyke.

But do I resent being paid less than Gossage? Of course not. That's because Gossage earned about 15 times as much as Dan Quayle, which seems fair.

That's the trouble with juggling numbers, as Pat Buchanan did with his "five times what the average American earns."

The fact is, the average congressman is not the average American. He is better educated, smarter, reads more, watches fewer game shows and soap operas on TV, knows more about law, foreign affairs, national problems and assumes greater responsibilities. So why shouldn't a congressman be paid as much as a weak-hitting utility infielder?

In the big federal spending picture, a raise for congressmen is just pocket change. The Pentagon will spend more than the entire congressional raise on a few airplanes that don't fly.

Yet, the average person becomes outraged at the thought of a public official—any public official—wanting a pay hike.

We demand good judges, yet we pay them less than they could earn chasing an ambulance. We want good governors to manage our states, but become indignant if they ask to be paid more than the manager of a small factory.

Isn't it kind of goofy that the president of the United States—the most powerful man in the world when he's awake—is paid less than a mediocre point guard in the National Basketball Association? Or a network anchorman? Or some local disc jockeys?

Or consider that Elvis Presley made about $15 million this year. That's not bad for someone who has been dead for 11 years.

That's the salary of 180 congressmen. Or 45 United States presidents. Although I'm not a big fan of George Bush, I hope that he will contribute more to this nation during the next four years than a deceased rock singer.

The key to the public pocketbook seems to be entertainment. Americans don't mind spending a collective fortune on anything that will amuse or divert them. That's why athletes and other entertainers become vastly wealthy. Michael Jackson, Bill Cosby, Bruce Springsteen, Madonna, they're all in the $20 million to $50 million a year range. Some golfer recently picked up more than a million in a weekend.

But we bang the table at the thought of a congressman making what any of the entertainers pay for a car.

Congress ought to wise up. Instead of going on C-Span and holding debates, they ought to learn to dance, sing and slam-dunk a ball.

HUMAN RIGHTS IN TURKEY

HON. EDWARD F. FEIGHAN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, in 1988 the Government of Turkey ratified the European Convention for the Prevention of Torture and the United Nations Convention Against Torture. Despite these well-intentioned efforts by the Ozal government, Turkey's Government is still responsible for the brutal and systematic abuse of human rights. This is the title of a new report by Amnesty International.

According to Amnesty:

* * * Although there has been a civilian government in power for more than five years Amnesty International has not observed any fundamental change in the widespread and systematic use of torture. In the first 10 months of 1988 eight people were reported to have died in custody as a result of torture.

This a troubling report. Its pages document the failure of the Government of Turkey to match its international statements condemning torture to a policy that ends its practice. More than 100 prisoners have died in custody between 1980 and 1984. According to AI, alleged torturers were prosecuted and convicted in only 15 of these cases. In other cases, security agents on trial for torture actually received rewards, and even promotions.

Turkey's human rights records will continue to be an issue of concern to Members of Congress and the American people. We have supported the efforts of the Turkish Government in returning the country to a democratic path. The Reagan administration has nurtured a strong political and strategic relationship with that Government. But, the failure to make progress in the human rights area—especially the failure to end the practice of torture—remains a serious obstacle to a better relationship.

I hope that the Government of Turkey will take a long hard look at the findings of this report and respond to the concerns raised by Amnesty's mission to that country last year. In the meantime, I commend the report to my colleagues and ask that the introduction to Turkey: Brutal and Systematic Abuse of Human Rights, be printed in the RECORD at this time.

TURKEY: BRUTAL AND SYSTEMATIC ABUSE OF HUMAN RIGHTS

INTRODUCTION

For years Amnesty International has been concerned about extensive violations of human rights in Turkey in all areas of its mandate: prisoners of conscience, unfair trials of political prisoners, the use of torture and the death penalty. Most notable is the widespread use of torture.

On 12 September 1980 the military seized power in Turkey for the third time in two decades. For more than three years the country was ruled by a National Security Council composed of five generals. By late 1988—eight years after the military coup, five years after a civilian government came to power and one year after its re-election—Amnesty International had not observed any fundamental change in the nature of human rights abuses in Turkey.

In the eight years following the military coup of 12 September 1980: Some 250,000 political prisoners were detained and almost all of them were tortured; thousands of them were imprisoned for non-violent political or religious activities (prisoners of conscience); over 60,000 political prisoners were convicted after unfair trials; over 700 death sentences were passed; over 200 of those sentenced have exhausted all appeals; 50 executions were carried out between October 1980 and October 1984; and over 200 deaths in custody occurred, many alleged to be the result of torture.

In recent years fewer people have been detained on political grounds, and consequently the number of prisoners of conscience has declined and so have the number of allegations of torture and reports of deaths in custody as a result of torture; yet there has been no significant change in the pattern of human rights violations.

Anyone detained on political grounds risks being tortured. Torture victims have also included common criminals, and even juveniles are reported to have been tortured. Amnesty International continues to receive reports of deaths in custody as a result of torture. The thousands of political prisoners include several hundred held for their nonviolent political or religious activities. Although martial law was lifted in July 1987, political trials are continuing in military courts that do not meet international standards for fair trial. State security courts, intended to replace the military courts, have applied similar rules since they were established in 1984. Death sentences are still passed by both military and civil courts.

For more than two decades Amnesty International has expressed its concerns to Turkish governments and drawn attention to violations of human rights in its annual reports and special reports on Turkey. Direct talks have also been held with successive governments, the latest from 27 to 29 June 1988 in Ankara and Istanbul. These were followed by a memorandum outlining Amnesty International's concerns which was sent to the Turkish Government on 25 August.

Amnesty International's most recent findings on Turkey were made public in its Turkey Briefing (AI Index: EUR/44/65/88) on 2 November 1988. This coincided with the launch of a campaign by the organization calling on the Turkish Government to take immediate steps to improve its human rights record.

This report, written in October 1988, updates the information in the Turkey Briefing and elaborates on the legal system which allows for human rights abuses on a large scale.

MOTOR VEHICLE THEFT LAW ENFORCEMENT IMPROVEMENT ACT OF 1989

HON. CARLOS J. MOORHEAD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I am today, introducing the Motor Vehicle Theft Law Enforcement Improvement Act of 1989 designed to enhance the ability of law enforcement agencies to investigate automobile theft.

Motor vehicle theft has been one of the fastest growing property-related crimes in the United States. In 1987 nearly 20 percent of all auto thefts in the United States occurred in California with almost half of these thefts occurring in the Los Angeles area.

Customs Service officials estimate that approximately 200,000 stolen vehicles are exported each year, primarily by professional thieves or people employed by them to effect the exportation. In the past, individuals shipping stolen vehicles out of the country submitted a shipper's export declaration which inadequately defined the item shipped. In addition, a shipper has up to 72 hours after the vessel has sailed to report to U.S. Customs that a vehicle has been exported. Title III of the Motor Vehicle Theft Law Enforcement Act of 1984 amends the Tariff Act of 1930 and was further amended by section 205 of the Trade and Tariff Act of 1984. It provides for civil penalties for each violation of knowingly exporting a stolen vehicle and requires documentation of a vehicle identification number [VIN] to be presented with the vehicle at the time of exportation. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to prescribe regulations implementing procedures for the lawful exportation of used vehicles. Pursuant to the provisions enacted under title 19 of the United States Code, the United States Customs Service has promulgated proposed regulations on two occasions for the exportation of used vehicles. The most recent proposals require that the vehicle destined to be exported must be presented to U.S. Customs officials with ownership documentation including VIN numbers at least 3 days prior to lading from exportation port.

The legislation introduced here today goes one step further to enchance detection of motor vehicle theft in an effort to curtail the exportation of stolen motor vehicles. The bill directs Customs Service officials to verify the vehicle identification numbers with the National Computer Information Center [NCIC] for the purposes of checking for stolen vehicles prior to exportation. It also requires the Secretary of the Treasury to submit a report to Congress within 180 days of enactment of the bill on the implementation of the system of verifying VIN numbers.

The National Auto Theft Bureau advises that last year 1 out of every 44 registered motor vehicles was stolen or had its contents or accessories stolen. Vehicle theft is still classified as the worst property crime when compared with related costs for larceny-theft, arson, and burglary as recorded in the FBI's uniform crime reports for 1987. Each year thousands of stolen vehicles are exported to Central America and other Caribbean nations. My legislation will require increased cooperation and improved communications on the part of Federal, State, and local agencies with law enforcement efforts to control the illegal exportation of stolen vehicles. I encourage my colleagues to support this legislation.

H.R. 315, LEGISLATION TO CODIFY THE FAIRNESS DOCTRINE

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, on January 3, 1989, the distinguished chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee, Mr. DINGELL, and I introduced H.R. 315, legislation to codify the fairness doctrine. I would like to take this opportunity to urge my colleagues to join as cosponsors of this important legislation.

On June 3, 1987, the House of Representatives passed by a 3-to-1 margin virtually identical legislation, which subsequently, was vetoed by President Reagan. After the President's veto of the legislation, and acting in the wake of a D.C. Court of Appeals ruling that the fairness doctrine was an administrative regulation and not a statutory requirement, the Federal Communications Commission repealed the fairness doctrine on August 4, 1987. Despite a 1969 Supreme Court decision in the Red Lion case upholding the fairness doctrine's constitutionality and in the face of clear congressional support for retention of the doctrine, the Commission decided that the doctrine was unconstitutional and no longer served its intended purpose.

Expeditious consideration and passage of H.R. 315 will erase any lingering doubt as to whether the Congress continues to support balanced and fair broadcasting. Further, expeditious action by the Congress will repair the damage done by the FCC's misguided repeal of this seminal doctrine.

For more than 50 years the fairness doctrine had been a cornerstone of our Nation's broadcasting policy. It had its origins in the Federal Radio Act of 1927, and it had been the practice of the Federal Communications Commission since 1949. The fairness doctrine is vital to the public interest. It guarantees that the public has full and balanced information about important issues of the day and is essential protection to ensure an informed populace.

Simply stated, the fairness doctrine imposed two affirmative obligations on broadcasters. First, the broadcaster must devote reasonable attention to the coverage of controversial issues of public importance. Second, the broadcaster must provide a reasonable, although not necessarily equal, opportunity for the expression of opposing views on such controversial issues.

The fairness doctrine did not require broadcasters to provide every side of an issue with exactly the same amount of time in exactly the same time period. It does, however, require broadcasters to ensure that their programming, taken as a whole, presents issues of public importance and does so in a balanced fashion. It does not seem to be an outrageous idea that broadcasters—who are granted, at no cost, the exclusive use of a scarce public resource, the electromagnetic spectrum—be required to inform the public in a responsible manner.

Opponents of the fairness doctrine have argued that it violates the first amendment and actually chills free speech. That contention is just plain wrong. The Supreme Court addressed that issue in the Red Lion decision 17 years ago and unanimously upheld the fairness doctrine. The Court held that, in the context of broadcasting, the rights of the viewing and listening public are paramount and that the fairness doctrine is both a permissible and effective method of vindicating those rights.

The Court also noted that a license to use the public airwaves is a privilege. It is not for the personal or private use of any individual or group of individuals. The Court stated, and I quote, "The First Amendment confers no right on licensees to prevent others from broadcasting on 'their' frequencies and no right to an unconditional monopoly of a scarce resource which the Government has denied others the right to use."

The fairness doctrine is as important today as it was in 1934. Despite technological changes resulting in more electronic media outlets, our Nation's broadcast spectrum still is scarce. Many more people seek access to the airwaves than the limited availability of broadcast spectrum allows. If you don't believe me, as the proponents of high-definition television who have expended substantial resources to reserve portions of the UHF frequency for broadcasting. Or ask the hundreds of Americans who have spent millions of dollars over the past few years to purchase broadcast licenses so that they also could become broadcasters.

A world without the fairness doctrine condones a world of information haves and have nots. Although VCR's, cable television, microwave television, and direct broadcast satellite television have provided alternative media outlets, there still is a clear role for free, local over-the-air broadcasting in today's electronic media marketplace. A strong public interest standard, including the fairness doctrine, is essential to ensuring broadcasters continue their long history of service to their local communities.

I urge my colleagues to join me in this effort to codify the fairness doctrine by cosponsoring H.R. 315.

REMARKS HONORING THE NORTH TOLEDO AREA CORP.'S 20TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. MARCY KAPTUR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, it's been said that the highest and best form of efficiency is the spontaneous cooperation of a free people dedicated to one another. Those of us who serve in Congress look to just such dedication for inspiration as we strive to respond to the confidence and trust bestowed in us. In their 20 years of working to secure a more promising future for their community, the North Toledo Area Corp. has provided a framework in which spontaneous cooperation and shared responsibility have been the foundation for a future of unlimited potential.

Whether to increase neighborhood safety, provide a Thanksgiving dinner to lonely and hungry neighbors, improve student counseling services, or organize a major neighborhood revitalization project, NTAC has been the threshold where creativity and competent ability meet to respond in concrete terms. Founded in 1969 and incorporated in 1970, NTAC has, from its outset, defined itself as a model for those dedicated to making a difference beginning in their own backyard. Young and old alike have joined efforts to promote those values and ideals which are the heart of any vital community. Through family oriented outings, neighborhood-sponsored sports activities, plans promoting new business and industry, and even the coordination of 52 neighbors to cut the grass of Riverside Park, residents of the north Toledo area have demonstrated that sometimes rare, yet always refreshing commitment to enhancing the quality of each other's life and surroundings. Hopes for a "kinder and gentler" America begin and are realized not in the context of political debate but rather through the home-grown and time-honored sense of respect for neighbor as for oneself.

I know my colleagues in the House of Representatives join me in commending the North Toledo Area Corp. on the occasion of their 20th anniversary for exemplifying the mutual reliance and determination that we so admire, cherish, and hope is contagious.

COMMEMORATING SHELLEY BERKLEY AS HADASSAH'S WOMAN OF DISTINCTION

HON. JAMES H. BILBRAY

OF NEVADA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. BILBRAY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor one of southern Nevada's most respected political activists, Shelley Berkley. On Saturday, January 28, the Las Vegas Chapter of Hadassah will honor Mrs. Berkley at their Annual Presidents Ball. Mrs. Berkley's list of accomplishments leaves no doubt that she is truly deserving of this honor.

Born in South Fallsburg, NY, Mrs. Berkley came to Las Vegas as an active, young student. She attended Valley High School, where she was active in student government and other extracurricular activities. Mrs. Berkley continued her education at the University of Nevada, Las Vegas, where she received her B.A. in political science and graduated with high honors. While at UNLV, she remained active in student government. Mrs. Berkley was a student council representative from 1969–71 and was later elected student body president in 1971–72. She was a member of Delta Zeta Sorority, Phi Lambda Alpha—Jr. Honor Society, and Phi Kappa Phi—National Honor Society, as well as being selected commencement speaker for UNLV's 1972 graduation ceremony.

Upon graduating from UNLV, Mrs. Berkley decided to further her political career by pursuing a law degree from the University of San Diego, where she received her J.D. in 1976. As an attorney, Mrs. Berkley has effectively subsumed her political activism into the legal process. She worked briefly as the State coordinator of the Consumer Product Safety Commission's Information and Education Program. She later worked as in-house counsel for Southwest Gas Corp. Currently, Mrs. Berkley serves as counsel for student government at UNLV, where she addresses the legal concerns of students and faculty members, offering advice and representing certain cases in court. She is also the arbitrator for the Nevada Arbitration Association, coordinator for the Clark County Bar Association pro bono project, and producer and cohost of the television talk show, "Legislature in Review."

Mrs. Berkley has won numerous honors and awards over the past few years for her commitment to helping those individuals less fortunate than herself. She has also been instrumental in advancing the concerns of the Jewish community in Las Vegas, as well as being a leader in the struggle for women's rights. Her presence has truly been felt throughout southern Nevada.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join me today in honoring one of southern Nevada's finest citizens, Shelley Berkley.

OPPORTUNITY FOR AMERICA'S VETERANS

HON. GERALD B.H. SOLOMON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which will improve the opportunity for veteran-owned businesses.

Many of our Nation's small businesses are owned by veterans who have honorably served this Nation as members of our Armed Forces. Some are also run by veterans who were held as prisoners of war.

These measures will allow both veterans with service-connected disabilities and former prisoners of war to participate in Department of Defense small business procurement actions.

Mr. Speaker, these bills will provide new opportunity to thousands of Americans who have health disabilities related to their service to our country. These bills are going to become public law.

LEGISLATION TO REPEAL "EARNINGS TEST"

HON. BOB STUMP

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing legislation to repeal what I believe is one of the most inequitable and inefficient provisions of the Social Security Act, the so-called "earnings test."

Under current law, Social Security retirees aged 62 through 69 are limited in what they may earn each year. Retirees who earn more than the established limits have their benefits reduced $1 for each $2 earned in excess of the threshold. In 1989, the thresholds are $6,480 for retirees under age 65, and $8,800 for those aged 65 through 69. Retirees aged 70 and older may earn as much as they want without penalty.

Mr. Speaker, supporters of the current earnings limitation argue that Social Security was designed to partially replace earnings lost due to a diminished capacity to work, and that a person who continues to work beyond retirement age has no "need" for this replacement income. I could not disagree more.

It is a sad fact that many of today's retirees either did not, or could not, make adequate financial provisions for retirement. Therefore, they must rely upon Social Security for nearly all of their retirement income. Many more have seen their retirement savings diminished or depleted due to circumstances beyond their control. These people do not want welfare, they want a chance to work. The earnings test, however, limits their ability to be self-supporting.

We should not force any retiree to return to work. But neither should we stand in the way of those who desire, or are forced out of economic necessity, to return to the work force.

Mr. Speaker, all retirees should be able to earn as much as they want or need without penalty. My bill is designed to help those retirees who wish to be less dependent upon the Government and more self-reliant financially. The Nation can only lose by denying our work force the wealth of knowledge and experience possessed by the retirement age population. The work ethic should not be abolished at age 62.

LEGISLATION TO AUTHORIZE EXTENSION OF AMERICAN CANAL, EL PASO, TX

HON. RONALD D. COLEMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce legislation to authorize the construction, operation, and maintenance of an extension to the American Canal in El Paso, TX, by the Secretary of State acting through the Commissioner of the International Boundary and Water Commission. I had introduced this bill late in the 100th Congress, and I am very hopeful that the committees with jurisdiction will move forward on this bill as soon as possible during the current congressional session.

The construction of an extension to the American Canal—which would lie in its entirety on the U.S. side of the international border—and its operations would result in a number of needed benefits to the communities on both sides of the border. Among these benefits are a more equitable distribution of waters between the United States and Mexico, the reduction of water losses, and the elimination of many hazards to public safety.

Congress has previously authorized this construction program when in 1976 it authorized the U.S. Bureau of Reclamation to construct such an extension. As a feature of the Rio Grande project, the American Canal extension would be located along the Rio Grande River within the city of El Paso, county of El Paso, in west Texas. The extension project would consist of widening about 1.4 miles of the existing American Canal, constructing a 13-mile extension of the canal, modifying traffic and drainage structures, and eliminating a portion of the existing Franklin Canal.

A number of benefits would be achieved in this area in Texas, and the canalization effort enjoys the support of local, State and Federal agencies. During the last 6 years, I have worked closely with local officials interested in the extension of the American Canal. The two most directly involved Federal agencies, the Bureau of Reclamation and the International Boundary and Water Commission, have both indicated their support for this project in view of the fact that numerous benefits would arise from the extension of the American Canal.

Primarily, this extension would result in the salvage of between 12,000 and 22,000 acre-feet of water lost annually because of seepage. Water transportation losses fluctuate greatly in the Franklin Canal as well as the Rio Grande due to the dirt lining and seepage losses. Salvaged water could increase annual allotments to each water right acre if a cement lined canal were available. The value of this amount of conserved water is enormous to a community such as El Paso because of the water shortage in the area.

Another benefit that would result is the elimination of health and safety hazards to El Paso citizens. The current use of the Franklin Canal, located in the downtown area, has created a health and safety problem because refuse and garbage are illegally dumped in the canal, creating a breeding ground for bacteria. Disease-carrying mosquitos, spiders, scorpions, and snakes breed and live in the vegetation along the canal, and stagnant water during the months when irrigation is not carried through the Franklin Canal creates further health problems due to contamination.

In addition, a number of drownings occur every year in the canal because of its proximity to residential areas. The 5.5 miles of the Franklin Canal I am proposing to eliminate have the heaviest density of population per square mile than any other area of El Paso. The average size of a family in this area is 5.6 persons, and the largest percentage of children in the families are less than 13 years of age and have no access to public or private swimming pools. The proposed extension would render the Franklin Canal obsolete and it could be filled in for some more beneficial public use in the area.

The possibility of international friction between Mexico and the United States would also be reduced if the American Canal is extended. The present canal does not allow optimal control over the portion of water belonging to the United States and illegal diversion of water is taking place by Mexican farmers. It is widely believed that potentially disruptive international issues might arise from the commingling of the waters of the United States and the waters of Mexico in this reach of the Rio Grande, while such issues would not arise if a canal extension were constructed and operated wholly on the American side of the river. The proposed extension would eliminate that diversion and would eliminate the source of potential disputes and tension.

This project would have the added benefit of creating construction jobs as well as other employment opportunities in a border area that is beset with economic problems and high unemployment as well as address numerous problems involving this community's most vital natural resource—water.

During the last congressional session, the Subcommittee on International Operations under the Committee on Foreign Affairs conducted a hearing on this proposed legislation. Having a record established in Congress, I am hopeful that this subcommittee and the Interior Subcommittee on Water and Power Resources, which also has jurisdiction over this proposed legislation, will have an opportunity to consider the bill at the earliest possible opportunity.

I ask my colleagues for their support and I look forward to working with them on this matter during the course of the session.

ALL 50 STATES SHOULD HAVE THE DEATH PENALTY

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, today I am reintroducing legislation that would deny Federal law enforcement funds to States that do not have in effect a law requiring the death penalty or life imprisonment without parole for those convicted of first degree murder or killing a law enforcement officer. I believe that this legislation is needed to ensure that justice is served and that dangerous murderers will never kill again.

I am repulsed by the fact that cold-blooded, vicious murderers are housed, fed, clothed and protected for the rest of their lives at the expense of honest taxpayers. A majority of the American people favor the death penalty and last year the Congress passed an important death penalty amendment to the omnibus drug bill that was signed into law.

According to the U.S. Bureau of Justice Statistics, only about 24 percent of convicted cop killers, from 1974–83 received the death penalty. Almost half, 48.5 percent, were sentenced to life in prison—which carries with it an average of less than 6 years of actual time served in prison. Mr. Speaker, this is an outrage and a disgrace. The lives of our brave law enforcement officers are certainly worth more than that. Cold-blooded murderers should be put to death—period. Action must be taken now by Congress to get all 50 States to adopt a death penalty statute for first degree murderers and cop killers.

Currently 37 States, including Ohio, have capital punishment statutes. My bill would apply to the 14 jurisdictions that do not have capital punishment statutes. They are: Alaska, District of Columbia, Hawaii, Iowa, Kansas, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, New York, North Dakota, Rhode Island, West Virginia, and Wisconsin.

Under this bill, States would have 2 years from the time of enactment to comply or face the loss of all Federal law enforcement funds.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation is a reasonable measure designed to ensure comformity in our laws and to ensure a measure of justice in dealing with cold-blooded, cruel killers. We are in the midst of a serious crime epidemic that is running rampant in our cities and is fast threatening our suburban communities. I urge all Members to support this legislation.

WILKES-BARRE ELKS LODGE CELEBRATES CENTENNIAL

HON. PAUL E. KANJORSKI

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. KANJORSKI. Mr. Speaker, this month marks the 100th anniversary of Wilkes-Barre Lodge 109 in the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. I am happy to bring their accomplishments to the attention of my House colleagues.

Throughout its 100-year history, Elks' Lodge 109 has been associated with several charitable organizations and has provided the community with many valuable services. Presently, the Elks organization is a leading contributor to the National Cerebral Palsy Foundation, providing care for those afflicted by cerebral palsy, and transportation and medical attention to those in need.

Lodge 109 is also involved with the youth of our community, providing young students with scholarship opportunities and financial assistance, giving hope to high school students who could not otherwise afford to attend college. The Elks have made positive contributions in the fight against drugs as well. Currently, Elks from around the Nation are waging their war against drug abuse with the "hugs are better than drugs" program. This program, designed to educate both parents and students about the deadly hazards of drug use, has been tremendously successful in raising community awareness. Speeches by area pharmacists, police officers, and former abusers have demonstrated to our children that drugs are a dead end, a message that the Elks' organization has spread throughout our Nation.

Mr. Speaker, Elks Lodge 109 has served the Wilkes-Barre community since 1889, and it is my sincere hope that the lodge's services will continue well into the future. The 320 men and 85 women—in the Elks' auxiliary—that comprise Elk Lodge 109 deserve the respect of the community and the Nation because they demonstrate to all of us that we can take the time to help our children grow, we can make a difference in the lives of individuals in need of help, and we can make our communities better places to live.

JUDY CHESSER GIVES NEW YORK CITY ROYAL TREATMENT

HON. THOMAS J. MANTON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. MANTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to call to the attention of my colleagues an article that appeared in Newsday recently regarding Judy Chesser, director of New York City's Washington office. Judy, who is a good friend and an excellent advocate, has done a truly regal job representing New York City's interests on Capitol Hill. I commend this article to my colleagues and ask that the article be printed in the RECORD at this point:

[From Newsday, Jan. 9, 1989]

CITY'S UNABASHED D.C. ADVOCATE—CALL HER SLUDGE QUEEN

(By Letta Tayler)

WASHINGTON.—She's a smooth-talking lawyer who dresses in Italian suits and shakes hands with the grace of a debutante.

So why is Judy Chesser called "The Sludge Queen?"

Because as Mayor Edward I. Koch's lobbyist on Capitol Hill, Chesser did what most city officials considered impossible: She's almost singlehandedly persuaded Congress not to fine New York City a whopping $730 million a year for dumping sewage sludge off the New Jersey coast.

The House had already approved the fines, but Chesser plotted alternatives. She made the rounds of public hearings, committee rooms and private lunches. She coaxed and cajoled congressional leaders, insisting that the penalties would decimate the city's budget for sewage disposal. She claimed the sludge was not linked to last summer's beach washups of raw sewage and medical waste.

She even toured the Wards Island sewage plant on the East River because, in her words, "I wanted to see what sludge looked like."

Chesser said, "We must have had over 100 meetings, just one-on-one in different offices, talking to staffs, talking to members of Congress."

The effort paid off. When a team of lawmakers negotiated a final sludge bill, they dropped New York City's annual fines to less than $188 million—and said the city could use 90 percent of those fees to finance new sludge dumping sites.

Chesser says sludge consumed more of her energy than any other issue in recent months. But the lobbyist also plies the halls of Congress for solutions to other seemingly insurmountable problems facing New York City, from AIDS and the homeless to air pollution and mass transit.

"Our whole role is to get as many projects, as much money as possible from here to the city of New York," said the 40-year-old Chesser, who worked for the federal government before joining Koch's staff. "And that means you've got to stay alert. Somebody changes one line in a bill and it can cost the city millions.

New York City received about $4.1 billion in federal funds last year. But Chesser said the Reagan administration's abolition of urban programs, especially general revenue sharing and urban development action grants, has cut aid to the city by about $500 million a year since 1980.

To keep that sum from dwindling further, New York City spent more than $758,000 last year for its Washington lobbying office—$77,000 for Chesser's salary and the rest for the office expenses, 10 staff members, and her vast New Jersey Avenue suite that's packed with Broadway theater guides and decorated with Manhattan cityscapes.

Most observers say Chesser is worth the money.

"She's competent. She's active. She's respected," said Brad Johnson, Gov. Mario Cuomo's liaison in Washington, who fought alongside Chesser to make sure New York residents can continue to deduct local income and property taxes under the nation's new tax law.

"There are some very expensive, incompetent representatives of cities here, but Judy is first class," said Frank Shafroth the chief lobbyist for the National League of Cities.

From securing $57 million for New York City homeless shelters last year to battling for passage of the nation's new drug-prevention law, "Judy makes a lot more for the city than she costs," Shafroth said.

Chesser has an unusually tough job because "a lot of members don't like giving aid to New York City," said Robert Dizard, an aide to Rep. Guy Molinari (R-Staten Island). "They figure it's a big Northeast city that should be able to take care of itself."

A loyal foot soldier who always refers to her boss as "the mayor," Chesser also has to contend with Koch's foes within the New York City congressional delegation, who often don't see the need to toe her line.

Chesser joined New York City's Washington office in 1981 and became its director three years later. She was tapped as an old Washington hand, having worked as a lawyer with the Securities and Exchange Commission and as a legislative aide in the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services.

With her government experience, Chesser concedes she probably could double her salary lobbying with a fancy law firm. "But so far I've never been driven by money alone," she added. "I find this job really challenging and interesting. I enjoy representing the city."

Not enough to live there, though. Although Chesser was born in Albany and graduated from Syracuse University, she was never a resident of the Big Apple.

"That's something I was very careful to make sure the mayor knew," Chesser said. "But I don't think that not having lived in the city hurts my work. I mean, your everyday New York citizen probably hasn't seen a lot of sludge either."

TRIBUTE TO TOM CARNAHAN

HON. HOWARD L. BERMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to an extraordinary individual and outstanding member of my community, Mr. Tom Carnahan, who will be honored by the San Fernando Board of Realtors for his devoted service as president.

Tom Carnahan symbolizes the spirit, energy, and future of the San Fernando Valley. He has served the southern California community for many years. His pleasant personality and willingness to be helpful has endeared him to both his colleagues in the real estate business and the public he has served so well. Under his leadership, more than 400 board members were appointed to serve on dozens of committees, thus involving members in every phase of community and professional activities. It is very important to Tom that the San Fernando Board of Realtors help the community it serves.

During his tenure as president, Tom has positively affected the lives of many and has diligently worked hard to improve and expand the board's activities and involvement in the community. Early in his term, Tom targeted the annual walk-a-thon for the Valley Mayors' Fund for the Homeless as one of the board programs worthy of expanded fundraising efforts. The 1-day event raised more than $12,000 in 1987 for area shelters for the homeless and battered women and children of the San Fernando Valley.

Tom Carnahan has had lifetime involvement with the San Fernando Board of Realtors. His father, Joseph Carnahan, was board president in 1961. Tom, himself, has been active in real estate for more than 13 years and a member of the board of realtors since 1976. He was selected realtor-associate of the year in 1981 and has served on the board's executive committee for 5 of the last 6 years, and in 1979 was elected to the board of directors. Both the senior and junior Carnahans are regarded throughout California as respected and knowledgeable realtors.

Tom Carnahan is also active in the California Association of Realtors where he was chairman or vice chairman of several committees. In addition, he has been a director of the National Association of Realtors since 1984 and has served on NAR's multiple listing service, policy, jurisdiction and publications committees.

Tom Carnahan is a native of the San Fernando Valley. He attended Pierce College, the University of Colorado, and the World Campus Afloat. He is married to Nancy and is the proud father of two daughters, Kinsley and Kate.

Few people have given of their time and energy as selflessly as Tom. It is my distinct honor and pleasure to ask my colleagues to join me in honoring Tom Carnahan, an invaluable member of our community.

CONGRESSIONAL TRIBUTE TO MONTCLAIR TOWNSHIP CLERK CONSTANCE ARNOTT ON HER RETIREMENT

HON. ROBERT A. ROE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, January 27, 1989, the fine people of the great township of Montclair in my Eighth Congressional District of New Jersey will pay honor to a distinguished public servant who has served Montclair for more than two decades and who is now retiring.

I am speaking of Mrs. Constance Buchanan Arnott, who has served in exemplary fashion as the clerk of the township of Montclair for the past 21 years and is stepping down from that position effective the end of this month. Officials from all levels of government, colleagues, friends, and family will join together to honor Mrs. Arnott on January 27 with a dinner at the prestigious Manor in West Orange. This is certainly a tribute well deserved.

Mr. Speaker, Constance Arnott was born in Rochester, NY, where she graduated from John Marshall High School and Rochester Institute of Technology. She has lived in Montclair for nearly a half century, having moved there on election day in November 1944. Since that time Mrs. Arnott has participated vigorously in all facets of community endeavors in this thriving township.

She served for many years as a volunteer on the Montclair ambulance squad. Mrs. Arnott also worked as a dietician, operated a clothing store in Montclair, and served as a financial secretary before becoming township clerk in 1967. She has held this important post with great distinction and has been recognized for her outstanding work on several occasions, having received the 1974 Municipal Service Award of the Montclair Jaycees, the 1982 John W. Cresbaugh, Jr., Citizenship Award of the Service Clubs Council, and an award in 1988 from the NAACP.

Mr. Speaker, I know that this event in Mrs. Arnott's honor will bring great pride to her family—her daughters Eugenia and Wendy, and her six lovely grandchildren, Gregory, Kevin, and Michael Bliss, and Whitney, Megan, and Alexa Delatush—and to all those who have known her and worked with her. For it is people who serve their communities the way Mrs. Arnott has done that make our towns, our States and our Nation a better place to live.

Mr. Speaker, I ask you and our colleagues to join me in paying tribute to a truly outstanding public servant, Mrs. Constance Arnott, the township clerk of Montclair, NJ.

JACKSON, MICHIGAN'S ROBERT JOHNSON—1989 CITIZEN OF THE YEAR

HON. CARL D. PURSELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. PURSELL. Mr. Speaker, few people can understand the seriousness of our Nation's drug problem like a local chief of police. That is particularly the case with the police chief in Jackson, MI, Mr. Robert L. Johnson. Under Johnson's leadership, the Jackson Police has cracked down on juvenile crime and domestic violence and in 1988 recorded more drug-related arrests than ever before.

Johnson took the initiative, recruiting citizens, community leaders and whole neighborhoods in the battle against illegal drug trafficking and use. He also realized that much of the drug problem is in the black community, of which he is a member, and he had the courage to say so.

For Johnson's willingness to confront Jackson's drug problem head on, the Jackson Citizen Patriot has named Johnson its "1989 Citizen of the Year."

Besides his work as chief of police, Johnson has made a significant contribution in his service on the Jackson Community College Board of Trustees, where he has been an ongoing voice for change.

Mr. Speaker, I value the opportunity to know and work with Bob Johnson. His success demonstrates the value of hard work, honesty and dedication to the principles that have made America great.

I ask my colleagues in the House of Representatives to join me in offering congratulations to Bob Johnson and in wishing him continued good health and success in all his future endeavors.

DELAY IMPLEMENTATION OF SECTION 89

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, another example of our misdirected attempt at tax reform is now surfacing. Section 89 of the Internal Revenue Code which directs employers with nondiscrimination rules for welfare plans and overhauls the rules, has missed sorely the intent and desire of this body to provide equal benefits for all employees. The Department of Treasury report, due last December, on the administration of these new changes has failed to be completed as of today. I ask my colleagues, how can we proceed with this program when no ground rules have been created?

Under section 89, employers would be required to demonstrate through a group of complicated tests, that their benefit programs do not discriminate against "nonhighly compensated" employees. Employers also must ensure equal use of the program by all employees. Section 89 is just another step in the direction of federally mandated, employer-provided health benefits. The pitfalls of this legislation are obvious.

The first problem is the overburdening concept of mandating health benefits. It should be the decision of an employer to provide those benefits that he can afford. It is not the role of the Federal Government to tell an employer how to run his business. In a free-market society, the marketplace will weed out employers who fail to provide adequate wages and benefits while those who do will reap the rewards of quality employees.

In addition to the overindulgence of Federal regulations, we must remember that increased Government interference costs businesses thousands of dollars to "administer in order to comply with section 89. The end result is that the cost-conscious business will take a position that will lead it to either dropping plans or accepting penalties.

Most employers wish to provide certain benefits to all employees. It would be a tragedy if the individuals that section 89 is designed to help turns around and bites them. I am introducing legislation that will postpone this ruling for 1 year, allowing us to study it further and decide if we are on the right track with this legislation. We must postpone it, if for no other reason than to send a message to the business community not to drop their benefit programs and wait until a broader understanding of the implications of section 89 are understood.

THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION DECEPTIVE MAILINGS STUDY

HON. OLYMPIA J. SNOWE

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing, along with 35 of my colleagues, legislation to require the Federal Trade Commission [FTC] to evaluate the degree, type, pervasiveness, and severity of injury resulting from misleading and deceptive mailings that mimic Federal Government documents. This is the same study that received unanimous support in the last Congress when it was offered as a floor amendment to the FTC reauthorization, H.R. 2897.

As you know, the area of deceptive mailings came under intense scrutiny in the last Congress. This year, I again introduced the Deceptive Mailings Prevention Act, legislation which was passed under suspension in the House last year. This bill will give greater authority to the Postal Service to evaluate and enforce regulations dealing with specific types of deceptive mailings.

Currently, the Postal Service has authority to request sanctions against organizations that are fraudulent in practice. Yet, even with additional legislation addressing misleading and deceptive mailings, the Postal Service can still only tackle the problem on a case-by-case basis. The FTC, however, has been given the responsibility by Congress for the "direct protection of the consumer" from deceptive and misleading acts or practices. The FTC, then, is in a unique position, as the principal Federal consumner protection agency, to address deceptive mailings on an industrywide basis. I believe it is the proper rule of the FTC to determine the extent to which a trade rule in this area is warranted. This action will serve to cmplement legislation strengthening the Postal Service.

This legislation addresses two principal areas of concern: When an organization uses symbols, seals, terms, and trademarks that imply they are connected with or endorsed by the Federal Government; and when a nongovernmental organization offers, for a fee, a service which is available either free of charge or at a lower fee from the Federal Government. The pervasiveness of these practices and the types of mailings, are known only anecdotally. For this reason, my amendment would require a study over 18 months to determine the extent of the problem of deceptive mailings of the types described. At the end of the study, the FTC would report to Congress on their results and any need to initiate a trade regulation. To the extent such a regulation is not needed, the FTC would indicate in their report the reason for such a determination.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the issue of deceptive mailings will grow worse with the availability of increasingly sophisticated direct mail technology and that provisions must be in place to protect consumers. This study is an important step in our efforts to prevent the use of deceptive and misleading mailings.

CONSERVATIVE OPPORTUNITY FOR PUBLIC HOUSING

HON. NEWT GINGRICH

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, the following is an editorial from the Atlanta Journal and Constitution written by Dick Williams. This article gives a realistic view of challenges which Jack Kemp will face as Secretary of Housing and Urban Development. I would urge each of my colleagues to read this editorial:

[From the Atlanta Journal and Constitution, Dec. 22, 1988]

KEMP TO PUT OPPORTUNITY AT DOOR OF URBAN POOR

(By Dick Williams)

Now is the time for good conservatives to come to the aid of the opportunity society.

Rep. Jack F. Kemp, by accepting the nomination to be the federal secretary of Housing and Urban Development, is putting his reputation—and that of progressive conservativism—on the line in the sinkhole of federal bureaucracies.

Mr. Kemp will need help from those younger conservatives who dubbed themselves the Opportunity Society a few years back.

It wasn't enough for President-elect George Bush to pick up the catchphrase. The advocates of enterprise and opportunity are going to have to do missionary work on behalf of Mr. Kemp's ideas.

If HUD doesn't build more public housing, liberals will scorn him. Conservatives, quite properly, will score the agency if it does.

It is the agency of Cabrini-Green, Pruitt-Igoe and Carver Homes. It is the agency that helped see to it that one in 11 Atlanta homes is public housing. It is the agency that enriches lavish downtown developers, fly-by-night contractors, overstuffed building trades unions and the mob.

Mr. Kemp, ever the optimist, is setting out to reclaim the cities taken hostage by the underclass and the down-and-out.

The New Yorker is taking a far greater risk than he has ventured in the past. Through 18 years in Congress, ideas were his passion, but direct risks were to be avoided.

Mr. Kemp ran for president, to be sure, but in 1980 he passed up the chance to win a U.S. Senate seat, allowing an unknown Republican wardheeler, Alphonse D'Amato, to sneak in. Mr. Kemp refused to challenge Mario Cuomo for governor, only to see another unknown, Lewis Lehrman, come within an eyelash of an upset.

Now Jack Kemp faces a far tougher pass rush than he ever saw in his days as a quarterback in the wild American Football League. He will need his face mask.

The pressure is on from the propagandists.

One thing on which both sides of the debate seem to agree is that large, public housing projects are deteriorating cesspools. From there, they diverge. Repair them or bulldoze them? Build more or allow tenant ownership of existing units?

The story of HUD under Ronald Reagan is typical of Mr. Reagan's warning about an Iron Triangle of congressmen, sympathetic journalists and special-interest groups.

Mr. Kemp's predecessor, the courtly Samuel Pierce, is roundly pilloried in the press and by Democrats. He is portrayed as caretaker over the strangulation of housing initiatives.

Yet the record is a bright one. In eight years, spending on housing subsidies to low-income families increased from $5.7 billion to $13.8 billion. The difference between propaganda and reality is in the method. The number of recipients increased by a third.

Mr. Reagan and Mr. Pierce opted out of the construction business and chose to give the poor a choice in where they live through rental vouchers. More people are served, but the construction industry is scorched.

Vouchers help prevent the creation of instant slums. By allowing people to live where they can find a place, they put pressure on innercity schools to improve.

They also are a start to ending a national scandal of 50 years standing. Save for the elderly, public housing was never intended to be generational or permanent.

At the dedication of Atlanta's Techwood Homes during the Depression, Eleanor Roosevelt herself described the nation's first federal housing project as temporary quarters for those in temporary need.

Generations later, we have generations of the same families living in Carver and Perry Homes as if taxpayer-subsidized homes were divine right, even the norm.

The naked eye sees that the creation of more public housing units creates more families needing them. The people of Yonkers, N.Y., viciously portrayed as racist or uncaring, see that clearly.

Mr. Kemp, the visionary behind the Reagan tax cuts of 1981, must find a way to spur the involvement of the free market in low-income housing.

Tax reform ended many of the benefits gained from constructing modest rental units. Developers need a carrot—such as Enterprise Zones—to draw them to blighted or transitional neighborhoods.

Most important, the poor need carrots to draw them toward a goal of home ownership. It, after all, is the American norm. Perry Homes is our curse.

CATASTROPHIC COVERAGE ELECTION ACT OF 1989

HON. ROBIN TALLON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. TALLON. Mr. Speaker, today I am reintroducing the Catastrophic Coverage Election Act of 1989 to make the Catastrophic Protection Act optional for all eligible beneficiaries. I invite my colleagues to join me in support of this needed legislation.

I first introduced the bill last September in response to many constituents who wrote and called demanding that Medicare catastrophic coverage be optional. Like most of my colleagues, I dread coming into the office every morning knowing that a stack of mail from angry seniors awaits me. The people of the Sixth District of South Carolina know how to get their message across.

I've always agreed with the idea that Medicare catastrophic coverage should be optional. I voted for the substitute offered by Congressman BOB MICHEL in 1987 that would have financed the new benefits from the optional part B of Medicare. Had that substitute passed as law, I think we would have a much more favorable response from our constituents.

When President Reagan first addressed the need for catastrophic health care, the idea was to provide coverage for people who were dependent on Medicare for their health care protection. By and large, the expansion of the program will provide significant new benefits at a good price to these people.

However, according the Congressional Budget Office, only 28 percent of enrollees have Medicare alone. In fact, approximately 62 percent of Medicare eligible individuals have some form of Medigap policy in addition to Medicare.

There are other numbers which point to the fact that catastrophic coverage ought to be optional. This year, according to CBO, 36 percent of part A enrollees will pay the supplemental premium through a 15-percent income surtax. This 36 percent will be paying for almost 63 percent of the new benefits. Clearly, seniors with a middle to higher income are expected to tow the line on this new catastrophic law.

Seniors can provide excellent reasons why they don't want the coverage. Some are retired Federal employees who have coverage. Others feel that they have saved conscientiously and that they don't want their income depleted by an additional premium. Still more feel that they will be paying for the coverage of others while receiving only minimal benefits themselves.

Insurance exists because of a future risk. While paying for basic health care coverage is worth the risk, Medicare catastrophic coverage ought to be more individualized because those people paying the premiums for such coverage may not feel that is "worth the risk."

Beyond these reasons, there is one basic reason why Medicare catastrophic coverage should be optional—the Government of the United States should be in the business of creating choices, not mandates for people.

Basic health care coverage is a necessity for all Americans and catastrophic coverage should be available to people who are not covered presently. Many agree that catastrophic coverage should be offered through Medicare. However, this coverage should not be at the expense of a large portion of the population simply because they are Medicare eligible.

The Catastrophic Election Act would allow Medicare eligible citizens to choose not to have catastrophic coverage. Individuals not wanting catastrophic coverage will file notice with the Department of Health and Human Services 1 month before eligibility. Beneficiaries would also have the option of coverage during November of every year. By doing so, a person would not have to pay the additional supplemental premium or the increase in the Medicare part B premium.

Remember, if Medicare catastrophic coverage is as good a buy as we intend it to be, then most seniors will choose the expanded coverage. But it is a right of all beneficiaries to have this choice.

KILDEE HONORS DEPARTING PAGES

HON. DALE E. KILDEE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. KILDEE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to express my personal gratitude to all of the pages who have served the House of Representatives so diligently this year. These dedicated and hard working young people will soon be leaving to complete their high school education. They are:

Tammy R. Aimesbury, Janice D. Barlow, Gregory A. Beard, Charles D. Blackburn, Neva M. Brinlee, Sherri Y. Burton, Tania M. Butler, V. Adam Carter, Matthew C. Cluney, Kirsten R. Close, Gary A. Collis.

Rachel E. Cothern, Rhonda K. Crandall, Beth J. Davidson, Peter De Los Santos, Melinda C. Dorin, Matthew B. T. Dodge, Scott C. Eckel, Susan E. Feigenbaum, Michele M. Gast, John M. Gibson, Scott E. Glenn.

Laura M. Hutcheson, Kathleen A. Huvane, John W. Hazel IV, Ruby M. Isala, Brendan T. Kelly, Sarah M. Kendall, Rebecca M. Kislak, Debra J. Klein, Christa M. Lachenmayer, Penny J. Lacer, Meric W. Lallier.

Stephanie L. Lager, Amy K. Lewis, Robert M. Lloyd-Still, Paul C. Lin, Russell A. Loftis, Candice M. Meyer, Nancy C. Marcus, Amy H. Mayer, M. Ashley McKinney Ger Tou Moua, David A. Nida.

Ernest Perez, R. Anders Porter, Peggy Reed, Lea F. Rice, Cheyenne Roberts, Ivan P. Sanchez, Maryellen P. Smith, Katherine A. Smolinski, Kyllie A. Spencer, Leslie A. Storey, Rolf T. Strasheim.

Bom Suek (Sam) Suh, Jessica M. Taylor, Adam J. Tratt, James (Andy) Walker, Jr., Robert E. West, Thomas E. Windish, Brian T. White Craig M. Williams Amy E. Wolf, Sasha C. Wozniak, Zakiya J. Wynn.

It is sometimes easy for the Members of Congress and their staffs to take congressional pages for granted. However, we all realize the importance that the congressional pages play in helping the House of Representatives operate. This group of young people, who have come from all across our Nation, represent what is good about our country. To become a page these young people have proven themselves to be academically superior. They have ventured away from the security of their homes and families to spend a period of time in an unknown city. This experience has allowed them to witness a new culture, to make new friends, and to learn the details of how our Government operates.

As we all have witnessed, the job of a congressional page is not easy. Along with being away from home, the pages must have the maturity to balance priorities for themselves and others. In addition to this, they must have the dedication to work long hours and have the ability to deal with people on a personal level. I am sure this will be considered as one of the most valued and exciting experiences in their lives, and that will this experience they will all move ahead to lead successful and productive lives.

Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join me in honoring this group of distinguished young Americans. They certainly will be missed.

FAIR FOOD LABELING AND ADVERTISING ACT

HON. JIM COOPER

OF TENNESSEE

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, anyone who goes to the grocery store on a regular basis knows that "lite" foods are one of the fastest growing products on the shelves. There are all kinds of "lite" foods now: "lite" syrup, "lite" french fries, "lite" beer. There's even "lite" dog food.

Consumers are creating the demand for these products. But consumers also expect that "lite" should mean something.

Yesterday I appeared on ABC's "Home Show" to discuss legislation I've introduced for the past 3 years to bring some sanity to the use of the word "lite." Very simply, my bill would create a uniform standard for "lite" products.

The folks on the "Home Show" conducted a call-in poll to see whether consumers agreed with me that we need to regulate "lite" labels. The response was overwhelming: 11,096 people supported my bill, and only 195 opposed it. Clearly, consumers expect honest labeling. The bill I introduce today will make sure they get it.

Americans have been making fundamental changes in their eating habits. In response to advice from medical and public health experts, we're cutting down on fat and sodium, watching our weight, and in general trying to choose healthier food. Industry has responded with a plethora of food products designed for the health conscious consumer.

Lately, the word "lite" has superseded "diet" as a beacon for those watching what they eat. Many "lite" products do deliver significant reductions. Some not only tell you what they have less of, they go further by providing the specific information needed to compare their "lite" product with their regular product.

Unfortunately, however, there are "lite" products on the market that fail to deliver what they promise. Studies show that consumers associate "lite" with a reduction in calories or fat. Industry has spent a considerable amount of effort to develop this association.

Yet there is nothing which says that "lite" must indicate a reduction in something consumers want to avoid. Sometimes "lite" describes the density, texture, taste, or even the color of the product. This means that the consumer choosing a "lite" product for health or dietary reasons may not get the reductions they expect.

Even when "lite" is not misleading, it can be confusing. Much of this stems from the fact that not all foods are required to have nutritional labeling. "Lite" products, because they make nutritional claims, must have nutritional labeling. This means that some "lite" products can make the claim that they have less fat, sodium, or calories without giving the consumer any basis of comparison. In the worst cases, products don't even tell you what makes them "lite"—you just have to trust that they're somehow better for you.

My bill would eliminate the confusion about the term "lite" by creating a uniform standard for it. In order to be labeled "lite," a product would have to have at least a one-third reduction in either calories, fat, or sodium. The product label would have to state the reduction that makes it "lite." This bill limits the comparative terms that can be used to describe a reduction in fat, sodium, or calories. In addition, my bill would prohibit foods from being advertised as "lite" unless they met these requirements.

I don't want to give the impression that Federal agencies haven't made any attempts to regulate the term "lite," because they have. Unfortunately, these efforts address only some "lite" products. In addition, they add to the confusion by creating different standards.

For instance, the U.S. Department of Agriculture defines "lite" as a 25-percent reduction in calories, fat, sodium, breading or other component of a food. However, this only applies to meat and poultry products, and is further limited in that it does not apply to frozen foods or entrees that use "lite" in the brand name.

Currently, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms only requires that "lite" alcoholic beverages bear a statement of average analysis, that is, the amount of calories, carbohydrates, and protein it contains. They've proposed various rules since 1986. The latest version offers two alternatives. The first would require "lite" alcoholic beverages to have at least a 20-percent reduction in calories, but would not require a statement to that effect on the label. The second would require the label to compare the calories in the "lite" and regular product—but with no minimum reduction.

The Food and Drug Administration [FDA] has interpreted "lite" as a nutritional claim, which triggers the requirement that the label must include nutritional information. If a product is "lite" because of a calorie reduction, then it falls under the FDA-defined term "reduced calories," which requires at least a one-third reduction. However, this leaves unregulated products called "lite" because of fat or sodium reductions.

In addition to developing a standard for the term "lite," my bill directs FDA to define officially the term "low fat." FDA uses a working definition of low fat that states a product must have less than 2 grams of fat per serving or less than 10 percent of fat by dry weight. Yet it allows 2 percent milk, which exceeds those limits, to be called low fat. Only milk with 1 percent or less milkfat actually qualifies as low fat, and FDA regulations should reflect that.

While the Federal agencies have taken some steps to regulate the word "lite," more needs to be done. The National Research Council of the National Academy of Sciences recognized the need for better regulation in their study "Designing Foods" released last year. Consumers can only make intelligent nutritional decisions when they know what labels mean. We must give them not only clear guidelines on interpreting labels, but also consistent guidelines.

My bill dispels the current confusion about foods labeled "lite." It lets consumers know that "lite" means a third less, and requires the label to disclose what the product has less of. It also limits comparative terms in order to end the free-for-all that now exists. These simple disclosure requirements will help consumers know what they are getting—or not getting—when they buy a "lite" product.

The Fair Food Labeling and Advertising Act enjoy the support of public interest groups such as the American Diabetes Association, the Consumer Federation of America, and the Center for Science in the Public Interest. I urge my colleagues to cosponsor this important piece of consumer information.

LEGISLATION TO ESTABLISH A WORLD WAR II VETERANS' MEMORIAL

HON. MARCY KAPTUR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, today, 53 of our colleagues join me in sponsoring legislation to establish a World War II Veterans' Memorial and Museum. As we approach the 50th anniversary of this Nation's entrance into World War II, there is no one single monument to honor all of our veterans, both deceased and living, who carried this Nation to victory in that conflict. We believe there should be such a place.

Over 16 million Americans served in this Nation's Armed Forces during World War II. Over 400,000 made the ultimate sacrifice in defense of freedom around the world. This was a conflict in which the choice between democracy and tyranny was crystal clear. That war also profoundly shaped the fundamental political, economic, and cultural alliances that have been operative in the decades since its end.

Only a national memorial and museum, located in our Nation's Capital, can pay tribute to those valiant men and women as well as give a sense of the times, the scope of the war, the numerous actors in that conflict, the multiple issues, goals, and objectives that came into play in the war and, of course, the enduring values to which our participation in that struggle was dedicated.

In the last Congress, this measure was endorsed by the major veterans' organizations, the head of the Veterans' Administration and was reported unanimously by the Veterans' Affairs Committee. I hope our colleagues will join us once again in honoring veterans of World War II and in sharing with future generations of Americans the lessons it has imparted.

BILL TO IMPROVE CONGRESSIONAL SECURITY FOR INTELLIGENCE INFORMATION

HON. GERALD B.H. SOLOMON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, since 1980, the President has been required by law to report intelligence operations to Congress under title V of the National Security Act. Last year, several committees of the House of Representatives recommended that the House pass further legislation in this area.

Under that bill, H.R. 3822—1987—not only would the procedures for Presidential reporting have been further delineated, H.R. 3822 would also have required the President—in all instances—to inform Congress within 48 hours of covert actions in support of U.S. foreign policy and national interests overseas. Similar legislation was passed by the Senate in S. 1721—1987.

Make no mistake about it. I oppose any effort to require the President to report such operations to Congress within such a time period. This is because it is essential—both under the Constitution and as a matter of common sense respect for our national security needs—for the President to have the flexibility to undertake sensitive operations abroad without burdensome reporting requirements.

Not only does reporting to Congress widen the circle of persons who have access to potentially extremely sensitive information. It also could prevent foreign countries from coming to our assistance due to their concern over leaks of sensitive matters attributed to the U.S. Congress.

H.R. 3822 was never brought to the floor of the House. Shortly after the bill had been considered by the Rules Committee, the Speaker of the House, JIM WRIGHT, made his notorious statements concerning alleged United States intelligence activities in Nicaragua. The Speaker claimed that he had information from the intelligence agencies that they were involved in civil unrest associated with the activities of the domestic political opposition in Nicaragua. The Sandinista government used political repression and violence to respond to a large opposition rally in the city of Nandaime and later—relying in part on the remarks of Speaker WRIGHT—attempted to justify their actions on the basis of supposed U.S. involvement.

Mr. Speaker, these events of last year only serve to reinforce the perception that Congress is one of the major sources of the national security leaks that have caused so much trouble in recent years. They show all the more the danger that increased congressional oversight of intelligence operations—without a corresponding increase in congressional security—would further cripple our ability to conduct intelligence operations.

The bill I am introducing today would respond to this concern. My bill, which is modeled after the amendments I submitted last year to H.R. 3822, is intended to ensure that the Congress adopt stricter security procedures with respect to intelligence information.

The bill would amend section 501 of the National Security Act, which is the section that contains the requirement of congressional notification for intelligence activities, particularly covert action. Subsection 501(d) of the current law already contains a requirement that:

The House of Representatives and the Senate, in consultation with the Director of Central Intelligence, shall each establish by rule or resolution of such House, procedures to protect from unauthorized disclosure all classified information and all information relating to intelligence sources and methods furnished to the intelligence committees or to Members of the Congress under this section.

In my view, the current rules of the House and Senate do not fulfill the statutory requirements. In particular, the rules of the House should be amended to contain specific standards governing the conduct of persons who receive intelligence information under the congressional oversight provisions.

My bill would amend subsection 501(d) to require that the procedures required by that subsection ensure that any Member of Congress, and any officer, staff member, or other employee of the Congress who gains access to intelligence information is made subject to security procedures that are comparable to those applicable to personnel of the intelligence community, including appropriate background investigations and periodic counterintelligence polygraph tests. In addition, these procedures would require in the event of a proven disclosure of intelligence information that access to intelligence information be denied any Member and continued employment be withdrawn from any staff member if that individual had knowingly disclosed such information.

Mr. Speaker, prior to the close of the 100th Congress our Nation's veterans' organizations and military associations had overwhelmingly indicated their opposition to the 48-hour reporting requirements of H.R. 3822 and their concerns about security on Capitol Hill. I request unanimous consent to have included in the RECORD the text of a letter I and several colleagues sent to the Members of the House recording the views of these organizations. In addition to the actions taken by these groups, a large number of communications were received by many Members of the House on this subject.

Mr. Speaker, I commend these organizations for their concern over the continued security and efficacy of critical intelligence operations. I believe that improved congressional security is a fundamental element of any proposal to increase congressional scrutiny of intelligence activities. As a member of the Rules Committee, I look forward to pursuing this proposal as well as others for improved security in the House of Representatives and the Congress in general.

It's time that Congress earned the trust of the new administration, and the American people, on its ability to function as a responsible partner in national security. I urge my colleagues to support my bill to improve congressional security for intelligence information.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, DC, September 21, 1988.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: We wish to draw your attention to the opposition of our Nation's veterans' organizations and military associations to the provision contained in H.R. 3822, the Intelligence Oversight Act of 1988, mandating the President to report all covert actions to Congress within 48 hours. These organizations represent over 10 million Americans dedicated to preserving the national security interests of the United States.

THE AMERICAN LEGION

"The American Legion cannot support the passage of H.R. 3822, the Intelligence Oversight Act of 1988, in its present form. We urge you to remove those provisions which would require notification within 48 hours of its authorization."

RESERVE OFFICERS ASSOCIATION

"The current statutory framework governing the management of covert action is working well and we urge Congress not to impose a mandatory requirement for the President to notify Congress of covert operations within 48 hours."

FLEET RESERVE ASSOCIATION

"It is interesting to note that all intelligence officials of recent Administrations, both Republican and Democratic, fully oppose the 48-hour notice of any covert action provision of H.R. 3822."

ASSOCIATION OF FORMER INTELLIGENCE OFFICERS

"Foreign governments may not participate in covert activity should there be a necessity to disclose their participation to the Congress. The Canadian government made withholding of such information from Congress a condition of their participation in the exfiltration from Iran of certain U.S. Embassy employees. Is the Congress prepared to trade a life for sensitive information?"

NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS ASSOCIATIAON

"This bill is an unfortunate overreaction to a singular incident concerning the timely notification of Congress. The language of H.R. 3822 is so restrictive it could potentially jeopardize all covert operations.;;

AMVETS

"We feel that the overall ramifications of H.R. 3822 would have an adverse effect on Americans who may find themselves in a hostage situation or other terrorist related situation."

RETIRED OFFICERS ASSOCIATION

"If H.R. 3822 were enacted, the element of trust between the executive and legislative branches, essential in the conduct of foreign policy, would be impaired."

VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS

"We oppose the 48 hour constraint imposed on the Chief Executive and urge you to vote to reject such language. Several former Directors of Central Intelligence have testified that such a time constraint will have a severe impact on our ability to act decisively when it is in our national interest to do so."

Sincerely,

Robert H. Michel, Trent Lott, Dick Cheney, William S. Broomfield, Robert J. Lagomarsino, Gerald B.H. Solomon, Henry J. Hyde, and Bob Livingston—Members of Congress.

PAY RAISE FOR MEMBERS OF CONGRESS SHOULD BE VOTED DOWN

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, on January 9, 1989, the President recommended in his fiscal year 1990 Federal budget request that the salaries for Members of Congress be increased from the present level of $89,500 to $135,000 a year. Congress has 1 month to vote on a resolution disapproving this pay raise. Should Congress do nothing, the pay raise takes effect automatically. For the 435 House Members and 100 Senators this increase would amount to approximately $21 million.

While I recognize the need to make salary rates for Federal judges and executive branch officials more competitive with the private sector, I do not believe that Members of Congress face the same problems of attrition as do the other two branches. Given the grave deficit problem facing the Nation, now is not the time to raise the salaries of Members of Congress.

Over the past 10 years the people in my area have taken it on the chin. They've seen their pay slashed and their standard of living downgraded. Although I recognize some of the financial difficulties associated with maintaining two residences and the high cost of living in the Washington, DC area, I also recognize that with the serious budget deficit problem facing this Nation we need to make every Federal dollar count. Congress needs to show some leadership in reducing the deficit, and voting down the pay raise is an excellent way to start.

Countless Americans will freeze to death this winter in the streets because there is a shortage of affordable housing; we have senior citizens who have to eat dogfood because their Social Security checks don't go far enough; college costs are skyrocketing at the same time Federal loan programs are being cut—these are but a few of the many major problems facing our Nation. Tough times lay ahead for many Americans. Its about time that Congress started making some small sacrifices.

Today, Mr. Speaker, I am introducing three separate pieces of legislation. These bills would:

First, disapprove the pay raise for Members of Congress;

Second, rescind the pay raise for Members of Congress should Congress fail to act on the motion to disapprove; and Third, amend Federal law to strike out the provision providing for the permanent appropriation of funds to compensate Members of Congress. This would force Congress to vote on the appropriation of funds for their own compensation.

These bills would provide the House with an opportunity to either vote down the pay raise, nullify the pay raise if the deadline passes with no action, or reform the entire system currently in place to set the salaries for Members of Congress. I urge all Members to support these three bills, which read as follows:

H.J. RES. —

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

That the Congress disapproves so much of the recommendations transmitted by the President to the Congress on January —, 1989, pursuant to subsection (h) of section 225 of the Federal Salary Act of 1967 (2 U.S.C. 358) as relates to the rates of pay for offices and positions referred to in subsection (f)(A) of such section.

H.J. RES. —

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

That (a) rates of pay for Members of Congress shall be determined as if the recommendations transmitted by the President to the Congress on January —, 1989, had, to the extent that those recommendations related to Members of Congress, been disapproved in accordance with section 225(i)(1) of the Federal Salary Act of 1967 (2 U.S.C. 359(1)).

(b) For purposes of this section, "Member of Congress" means an individual holding any office or position within the purview of subparagraph (A) of subsection (f) of section 225 of the Federal Salary Act of 1967.

(c) The provisions of this Act shall apply with respect to pay periods beginning after the date of the enactment of this Act.

H.J. RES. —

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

That section 130 of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution making continuing appropriations for the fiscal year 1982, and for other purposes" (approved October 1, 1981; Public Law 97-51) is amended by striking out subsection (c) (relating to permanent appropriations for compensation for Members of Congress).

CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO THE TOWNSHIP OF BELLEVILLE, NJ, ON ITS 150TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. ROBERT A. ROE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, it is with the greatest pride that I rise today to salute an outstanding community in my Eighth Congressional District of New Jersey which, in 1989, is celebrating a truly historic occasion. I am speaking of the township of Belleville, which in 1989 will be celebrating the 150th year of its founding.

This observance, which is a testament to the strength and perseverance of the fine people who settled this outstanding municipality more than a century ago, and who have made Belleville a thriving community at the hub of the bustling metropolitan northern New Jersey area, will be celebrated with a special dinner on January 28, 1989, at the Chandelier Restaurant in Belleville. I would like to take this opportunity to send an especially warm greeting of congratulations to Belleville's distinguished town fathers who have done so much to make Belleville the great community that it is today, Mayor Michael P. Pizzi and Commissioners Vincent J. Frantantoni, Joseph Fornarotto, Joseph F. McGreevy, and Angelo C. Risoli.

Mr. Speaker, the history of Belleville, which was officially incorporated as a township on February 23, 1839, is a rich and varied one. In order to best convey the spirit of the transformation of this multifaceted, closely knit community, I would like to quote from the official history as prepared by David S. Bryant, chairman of the 150th Anniversary Committee and director of the Belleville Public Library:

Belleville, as a special place along the Passaic River, has a history that began centuries before the 1839 date that we celebrate in this sesquicentennial year. Belleville, with lush woods and vast meadows, was home to Indians and then the early English settlers who built gracious homes along the river. Belleville was a comfortable place where ideas and inventions flourished, where copper mines and sandstone quarries as well as early factories provided many employment opportunities.

In this 150th Anniversary year, we can review Belleville's economic evolution from a town known for farming to a manufacturing center and presently, to a location where service industries and retail marketing flourish. Early housing stock was supplemented by homes for workers and, more recently, an abundance of condominium development.

Throughout this evolution in Belleville's appearance and economics, a strong sense of community pride and family life has continued. Belleville's reputation as a warm, giving community persists in our sesquicentennial year. The people * * * at work or play, make spirited, shared efforts to make Belleville the 'Beautiful Village' that is its name.

Today Belleville is a bustling microcosm of the metropolis just a few miles away. With a population in excess of 35,000, it features a highly accessible transportation system, and outstanding governmental, educational, and recreational facilities. The Belleville Public Library contains more than 100,000 volumes and a recent survey of Belleville High School by the Commission on Education—Middle States Evaluation Team yielded the highest rating possible.

Mr. Speaker, Belleville is, indeed, a great American community in every sense of the word, exemplifying the cohesiveness and the strong family and community values that serve as the fabric that keeps the American people and our great Nation woven together.

Mr. Speaker, I invite you and your colleagues to join me in saluting a truly outstanding American community celebrating its 150th anniversary, the great township of Belleville, NJ.

A TRUE FAMILY CARE PACKAGE

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, child care legislation and what the Federal Government's responsibility in this area should be, is becoming one of the hottest topics before Congress. The issue centers around the Federal Government's role in assisting the record number of mothers entering the work force that results in the obvious need for someone to care for their children.

I am introducing legislation today that not only addresses the pressing need for child care, but also another important need that is being overlooked, the need to take care of handicapped family members and also our aging family members. My bill, the Family Care Package of 1989, will give a tax deduction to the family and allow them to have more take-home pay, after taxes. A parent will be able to use this extra money to choose what is the best child care for that family. In addition, it encourages care of our parents, and other dependent family members often forgotten in today's nuclear family environment.

My legislation would address pre-school-age dependents by allowing a parent to receive a tax deduction of $3,000 from birth to age 6, and a $2,000 deduction for children between the ages of 6 and 18. Furthermore, it would allow a taxpayer to receive a $3,000 tax deduction in the case of any qualified dependent who is physically or mentally incapable of caring for himself. Finally it would allow a $3,000 deduction for any dependent who has reached the age of 55. All of these deductions would also be indexed yearly for inflation.

The taxpayer who provides more than 50 percent of financial support to a dependent over 55 qualifies for this deduction. The dependent's earned income will be only those distributions stemming from direct compensation such as wages, salaries, and other forms of direct compensation. Not included as earned income are pension income, retirement benefits, interest income from retirement accounts, and other such proceeds. Wage earners whose direct compensation is over $3,000 in a tax year would not qualify for the appropriate deduction.

Current law provides for a deduction for any dependent child of $1,950. The current dependent care credit ranges from 20 percent for upper income individuals to 30 percent for lower income individuals, of care cost. This credit is provided for a percentage of up to $2,400 for 1 child or $4,800 for two or more children. A 30-percent credit would only return $720 for the lowest adjusted gross income level and $1,440 for more than 1 child. My legislation would increase the deduction for children and at the same time abolish the highly ineffective existing child care credit.

The need for this increase in tax deductions is twofold. First, the value of the dollar when the dependent deduction was added to the tax code has failed to be adjusted for the rate of inflation over the years. The proposed deduction would allow the family to regain some equity from this indexing. Second, the family has suffered financially because of the lack of indexation.

The reason the United States is facing this current child care problem is not because of the lack of day care programs, but because of the erosion of family income. That is caused by a tax code that is increasingly biased against dependent children. Rearing children is something which is socially necessary and desirable, and so our tax code should be trying to encourage that. But it is not. The heavy tax burden shouldered by young families is exacerbated by inflation. Consequently that inflation has steadily undermined the value of the income exemption for children. My legislation would take one giant step in the direction of restoring the relative value of the exemption for young children to the level which existed in the 1950's. With the higher exemption, families would be free to use the added income for any purpose they chose, including choosing the day care system of preference.

Over the years, the American three-tier family has disintegrated into today's nuclear family. America has benefited materially and culturally from the three-tier family concept. My legislation will encourage reformation of that time-honored and valued concept. The deduction that I propose guarantees parental choice. They could choose a professional day care center, a church-affiliated center, or care provided by grandma, or even a mom or dad. A tax deduction for other individuals who are dependents would encourage families to take care of their older parents, as well as other handicapped family members instead of institutionalizing them. All too often today, families are finding it economically unfeasible to take care of their older parents and relatives. We, the Members of Congress, must stop penalizing the great American family and its proud heritage. We must take the time to allow the family to be reunited.

LUCEY HENNIGE—A CHAMPION ON AND OFF HER SKATES

HON. BUD SHUSTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. SHUSTER. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I call the attention of the U.S. Congress to Mrs. Lucille Hennige, who has served me and my constituents so ably, so competently, and so compassionately for almost 12 years.

But it is not for her excellent casework that I speak of her today. Lucey Hennige has an another dimension to her life that I feel warrants special merit.

When Lucey was only 12 years old, she received a pair of shoe roller skates designed for indoor rink skating. Endless practice coupled with natural talent led Lucey to membership in the Roller Skating Rink Operators Association of the United States and to a long series of Virginia State, regional and national competitions. Lucey captured the Virginia State title as novice ladies free style in 1945 and 1946; and won the Virginia State Intermediate Ladies Championship in 1947.

Spinning, jumping, and fancy footwork to Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue, Lucey and members of her pairs team became the U.S. champions in Oakland, CA, in July 1947. It wasn't easy to get from Norfolk, VA, to Oakland, CA, in those days. Back home her fellow skating club members collected newspapers for months to finance the long, arduous trip; as well as skating for the USO and the March of Dimes to add to the fund.

Lucey tells me that she was inspired by the famous ice skater, Sonja Henie. Lucey is herself an inspiration. She was a pioneer in transforming roller skating into a sport worthy of the Olympics. Roller skating was being considered for the 1947 Olympics, but the war with Germany prevented the competition that year. Lucey understood the unfortunate chain of events that kept her from performing in the Olympics, so she especially treasures the U.S. Gold Medal she won in California.

Long after her roller skates have been put away, Lucey is still "dancin'." Roller skating is an arduous sport requiring great athletic and artistic skill. To look at Lucey, she's petite, she's tiny, but she's one great lady who can swirl, twirl, and move gracefully to the rhythm and the beat of her beloved music with or without her roller skates. I know because she also beats a mean Pennsylvania polka.

STATE FISH AND WILDLIFE ASSISTANCE ACT

HON. NICK J. RAHALL II

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the legislation I, along with the distinguished gentleman from Idaho, LARRY CRAIG, are introducing today, the State Fish and Wildlife Assistance Act, is to enhance game and nongame fish and wildlife programs in States with acquired Federal lands through the establishment of a dedicated fund financed by a portion of mineral receipts collected from Federal leases on these lands.

By way of background, the Interior Department's Bureau of Land Management [BLM] administers the Federal mineral leasing program on both public domain and federally acquired onshore lands. The Department's Minerals Management Service [MMS] is charged with collecting all mineral leasing receipts, such as from bonuses, rentals, and production royalties, as well as administering the Outer Continental Shelf oil and gas leasing program.

Currently, mineral receipts collected from Federal offshore leases on the Outer Continental Shelf are distributed to the land and water conservation fund and the historic preservation fund as well as the general fund of the U.S. Treasury. For Federal onshore leases on public domain lands, 50 percent of all revenues collected are returned to those States where the leases are located, 40 percent is deposited into the reclamation fund and the remaining 10 percent into the general fund of the U.S. Treasury.

There is, however, no dedicated fund for mineral receipts collected from Federal leases on acquired lands. The term public lands is often used in reference to all Federal land holdings, however, the mineral leasing laws distinguish between those lands purchased by the Federal Government, called acquired lands, from those which have always been in Federal ownership, known as public domain lands. This legislation pertains only to mineral leasing receipts from federally acquired lands.

While the MMS both collects and distributes to the States their share of mineral receipts from leases on public domain lands, for acquired Federal lands after the agency collects the mineral receipts it credits them to the agency that has administrative jurisdiction over the land. These surface managing agencies utilize a variety of different State share mechanisms ranging from a 25-percent State share for mineral receipts collected on Forest Service acquired lands to a 75-percent State share for lands administered by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers.

In fiscal year 1987, approximately $50 million was collected from Federal mineral leases on acquired lands located in 40 States. The vast majority of these mineral receipts, 94 percent, were collected from leases on Forest Service lands with lesser amounts from those located on acquired lands administered by the BLM, the Bureau of Reclamation and the Army Corps of Engineers. While a small amount of mineral leasing receipts are collected from Fish and Wildlife Service lands they would be exempt under the legislation as from current law any amounts remaining after allocation to the States are dedicated to the migratory bird conservation fund.

The State Fish and Wildlife Assistance Act is premised on the concept that it is appropriate for development oriented activities such as oil and gas leasing, which are not necessarily conducive to fish and wildlife habitat, be made to contribute to the national commitment to enhancing these resources.

Specifically, this legislation would dedicate 50 percent of all bonuses, rents, and production royalties collected from Federal mineral leases located on acquired lands to a newly established State Fish and Wildlife Assistance Fund to be administered by the Secretary of the Interior. For the balance of these mineral receipts, the existing State/county and Federal shares would remain unchanged by the legislation.

Under the bill, amounts deposited in the fund would be allocated to the States to support game and nongame fish and wildlife habitat management activities, including improvement and restoration programs; threatened and endangered species conservation programs; fish stocking programs; and, fish and wildlife habitat improvements on Federal lands through cooperative agreements. If this legislation had been in effect during fiscal year 1987, it would have made available approximately $26.5 million to the States for these purposes.

For a State to qualify for these funds it must contain lands leased under the 1947 Mineral Leasing Act for Acquired Lands. An exception has been made to this requirement for the State of Alaska. For the purposes of this legislation, lands in the national petroleum reserve would be considered acquired Federal lands, thereby ensuring Alaskan participation in this program.

The bill provides a formula for the apportioning of funds to the States. One-half of the allocation is to be based on the ratio of acquired Federal land to the total land in the State, relative to the average ratio in the United States. The other half of the allocation is to be based on the ratio of paid fishing and hunting license holders to total State population, relative to the average ratio in the United States. Finally, each State would be required to submit an annual report to the Secretary of the Interior detailing the disposition of all funds received pursuant to the State Fish and Wildlife Assistance Act.

TRIBUTE TO BEN GOULD

HON. CONSTANCE A. MORELLA

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mrs. MORELLA. Mr. Speaker, the State of Maryland and Montgomery County suffered a tragic loss with the untimely death of Ben Gould, former governmental affairs chairman of the Maryland Association of Retarded Citizens and two-term president of the board of the Montgomery County Association.

Ben Gould was a staunch advocate for the disabled for many years, and his contributions will be greatly missed. In 1980, Ben chaired the ARC/Maryland Governmental Affairs Committee and cochaired the committee with Madeleine Will in 1981. He served on the drafting committee which developed the 1986 Maryland developmental disabilities law. From 1982 to 1984, he served as president of the board of the ARC in Montgomery County. At the time of his death, he was chairman of the ARC/Maryland Governmental Affairs Committee on Federal Legislation.

Ben received both his undergraduate and law degrees from New York University, where he later taught transportation courses. He moved to the Washington area in 1956; he joined the Interstate Commerce Commission and became chief of law enforcement.

Ben retired in 1977, although he hardly retired—he devoted his energies and perseverance to giving dignity and opportunity to the disabled. During my service in both the Maryland State Legislature and in Congress, I worked extensively with Ben. He was particularly instrumental in the drafting of legislation which I introduced last year to provide a deduction for the amount of premiums paid on life insurance contracts established as trusts for disabled individuals. Ben also provided me with a great deal of guidance in legislation affecting the disabled, and his advocacy skills were reflected in the excellent legislative record of the Maryland congressional delegation on these issue.

Truly, Ben Gould will be missed. His integrity, warm personality, intelligence, and sense of humor will always be remembered. To quote a resolution prepared in his memory by the Association for Retarded Citizens of Maryland:

We convey to Edith, John, Susan, Chuck, and Daniel, that we are at one with them in the sorrow of their irreplaceable loss, and * * * we know that they will find some comfort—as do we—in the wonderful memories we all have of that truly splendid man.

THE "SOFT ON DEFENSE" MYTH

HON. MATTHEW F. McHUGH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Speaker, one of the myths of the recent Presidential election is that Michael Dukakis lost because he was perceived as being "soft on defense."

In a recent article in the Christian Science Monitor, Edith Wilkie, the Executive Director of the Arms Control and Foreign Policy Caucus, lays this myth to rest. As she notes:

Defense was a non-issue in the crucial month when voters climbed into the Bush bandwagon, and the voters who jumped to George Bush were not the "tough on defense" voters.

In short, support for nuclear arms control and improved relations with the U.S.S.R. did not turn the election against Dukakis, and Democrats would be making a mistake to assume otherwise.

Mr. Speaker, I am inserting a copy of Ms. Wilkie's article into the RECORD at this point for the benefit of those who may not have seen it:

[From the Christian Science Monitor, Dec. 21, 1989]

DEFENSE DIDN'T DO IN THE DEMOCRATS

(By Edith B. Wilkie)

As the Democratic Party begins to plan for 1992, some of its neoconservative elements are already calling for a move to the right on defense issues, arguing that Michael Dukakis went from a double-digit lead to a double-digit deficit because he was "soft on defense."

In fact, defense was a non-issue in the crucial month when voters climbed onto the Bush bandwagon, and the voters who jumped to George Bush were not the "tough on defense" voters. Democrats should put to bed the myth of the defense dilemma, and should move toward 1992 with a strengthened commitment to both nuclear and conventional arms control and to a ceiling on military spending.

The polls show that Mr. Dukakis's double-digit lead turned sour in August—a month before the "soft on defense" issue was raised (even in commercials or by surrogates), and a full two months before Mr. Bush himself started to attack on the issue.

But more important, the change came about during the time that Bush was talking about a kinder and gentler nation—not a more heavily armed one.

Further, the polls show that the voters who abandoned Dukakis in August were not the constituencies supporting a "tough on defense" policy, but rather were (a) women: a 24-point lead in June disappeared by mid-September, and women ultimately broke even on election day; and (b) younger voters: a nearly 20-point lead in Atlanta started evaporating in August, and by election day they voted for Bush.

The "tough on defense" voters were either already with Bush (e.g., the Southern voter) or did not take a position until long after Bush surged ahead (as in the case of the Reagan Democrats, a majority of whom, in the end, "came home" to the Democrats). In short, the "tough on defense" voters were not swing voters.

Finally, "defense," traditionally defined as military power, simply was not a big issue for the American voter in 1988. While there were clear differences between the candidates on specific weapons systems, there was little difference between them on the level of the military budget or on the general approach to the Soviet Union under Mikhail Gorbachev.

Also, polls taken throughout the campaign cycle showed that military security issues rarely appeared on voters' lists of top five issues: one GOP pollster shortly before election day found that an all-time low of only 8 percent of the voters named a foreign policy issue as their most important issue.

Insofar as defense did have an impact, Dukakis' problems were caused far less by his support for arms control than by two other factors: his failure to define, clearly and coherently, an overall national security policy; and his lack of experience in foreign policy—frequently cited by voters as a negative. The Bush media team cleverly capitalized on these weaknesses—picturing not only a somber Bush shaking hands with Mr. Gorbachev, but also a grinning Dukakis seemingly playing war games in his battle tank.

Before a "soft on defense" myth develops, we should remember the factors that did play a key role in the campaign: the use of symbols (expecially Willie Horton), the absence of a prompt counterattack to those symbols, the declining importance of party affiliation, and the state of the economy. Perhaps the most important factor, if election day exit polls are to be believed, was the personal image of the candidate—especially the qualities of experience and competence.

Neo-conservative Democrats who try to finger the defense issue as the loser in 1988 can be expected in the months ahead to urge a "go slow" approach on a START treaty, to embrace modernization of all legs of our strategic triad, and perhaps even to backtrack on arms control victories won in 1988.

The wiser heads in the Democratic Party will assert that we already have sufficient deterrence; that the arms control process must continue and be strengthened by negotiating both arms reductions and qualitative restraints—including an end to nuclear testing; that an arms race in space must be averted; and that now, when the United States is grappling with a huge deficit, and the USSR is struggling to reform its economy, is the time to seize the opportunity to hold down military budgets.

The lesson of 1988 is that strong support for nuclear arms control and improved relations with the USSR under Gorbachev did not turn the election. In planning for 1992, the Democrats would be well served to look at the facts of 1988, not the myths.

CONGRESSIONAL SALARY INCREASE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I rise to strongly object to the congressional salary increase recently submitted to Congress by President Reagan. I do not believe that a pay increase of this magnitude is ever justifiable, but I find it particularly objectionable now as our Nation confronts immense Federal budget difficulties. President Reagan's proposed budget for fiscal year 1990 calls for reductions in spending for Medicare, for veterans' health services and benefits, for agriculture, for child nutrition, and for other critical programs. How then, can the President or Congress possibly justify a huge increase in salary at this time?

I believe that the salary increase is wrong, but I also believe that the process by which it is secured is in great need of reform. While it is true that Congress surrendered the power to set its salary for the laudable goal of removing itself from self-serving opportunities, it is wrong that pay raises established by the President can become law without a recorded rollcall vote of the congressional membership. For that reason, I am cosponsoring H.R. 401, which would change our system to require a recorded rollcall vote when any President raises congressional salaries. It would also require that any raise which is enacted should not take effect until there has been an intervening election. This reform would restore accountability to our constituents and help diminish the public cynicism and contempt which is generated by the existing pay raise system.

I invite my colleagues—Republican and Democratic—to join me in sponsorship of H.R. 401, and I submit as forcefully as possible that the current salary increase should be subject to a rollcall vote and be defeated. Let us move on from this business to resolve the real problems challenging our Nation—most important, the massive Federal budget deficit.

LET'S GIVE UTILITY CONSUMERS A BREAK

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, I have reintroduced legislation (H.R. 118) which would restore prior law and eliminate a burdensome tax cost to utility customers, Government agencies, farmers, homebuyers and renters, developers, and others in your district. The Tax Reform Act of 1986—1986 Act—repealed former section 118(b) of the Internal Revenue Code, which had allowed a utility company providing electric, gas, water, or sewage disposal services to exclude from its gross income contributions in aid of construction [CIAC] which a utility customer or another party had contributed to the company.

Utility companies currently must include in gross income amounts received for the construction of special facilities and pay a tax on these contributions. For example, the amounts a utility receives for construction of special utility lines for a new housing development or to provide essential municipal services are now subject to taxation.

The current tax is not really a tax on utilities, however. Public service commissions, which regulate the utility companies, require them to collect the cost of the income tax attributable to CIAC either, first, from all customers generally, through across-the-board increases in utility rates, or second, from the contributor making the CIAC, such as a Government agency or developer requesting the special utility line. To illustrate the impact of this tax policy, when a hospital needs an emergency backup powerline, a State or local government needs a separate waterline for a school or municipal building, or even the Federal Government needs an extra utility line to a military or similar facility, the cost of the tax on the associated CIAC would be imposed either directly on the contributor or all utility customers in the affected service area.

The tax on a CIAC also can have a profound impact on the price of new homes. If homebuilders pay the cost of the tax on a CIAC made in conjunction with a new housing development, the cost of a new home could increase by as much as $2,000. Even those who rent could be subjected to increased rental payments in such instances.

In short, all utility customers or contributors in need of special utility facilities feel the impact of the tax on the CIAC imposed under the 1986 Act. By restoring prior law, H.R. 118 would exclude a CIAC from a utility's gross income and would eliminate this adverse impact on consumers. The bill would eliminate the cost of the tax on the CIAC and thereby lower the cost of providing utility services.

Beyond the economic reasons to restore prior law, the imposition of a tax on a CIAC is simply not good public policy. Current law indirectly results in the taxing of State and local governments, as well as the Federal Government itself, which flies in the face of sound public policy. The bill also would permit the provision of certain essential governmental services otherwise precluded by budget constraints.

Please join me in correcting this serious public policy error.

UKRAINIAN CONGRESS OF AMERICA CELEBRATES ANNIVERSARY OF UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of my colleagues to the celebration of an important anniversary of freedom. On January 22, the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America, southeastern Michigan branch, will mark the 71st anniversary of Ukrainian Independence. Thanks to the good work of the Ukrainian community, the hopes and aspirations of the freedom-loving Ukrainian people are expressed at this annual celebration. The ongoing struggle for human rights and legitimate nationalist aspirations in the Ukraine is more important than ever as we witness some encouraging developments in the Soviet Union. Let us hope Mr. Gorbachev will bring true respect for human rights to the Soviet Union along with honest respect for the rich culture and language of the Ukrainian people.

The tragedy of the Ukraine should be studied and remembered by all Americans. Let us teach our children to profit from the mistakes of the past so that we in the Free World will never lose the liberty that we cherish so deeply. I want to briefly share some of the history of the Ukraine with my colleagues in the Congress.

The Ukraine issued its proclamation of independence on January 22, 1918, and enjoyed the freedoms of a Western democracy for a scant 3 years. An elected parliament governed the Ukraine and that nation had close diplomatic ties with many countries while the Ukrainian people pursued their own destinies and practiced their own religion.

That freedom-loving nation was crushed by the soldiers of the expanding Soviet empire. The Bolshevik armies swept into Ukrainian cities and a puppet government was soon established. The Ukrainian people began their years of suffering under the oppression and tyranny of the Kremlin dictators.

The Ukrainian people, however, were not ready to submit to slavery imposed by either the Soviets or the Nazis. In 1941, the German Army invaded the Ukraine and met heavy resistance from representatives of the Ukrainian National Liberation Movement and a provisional Ukrainian Government. As the Soviet troops retreated, the Ukrainian underground broadcast the declaration of restoration of independence and established a Ukrainian free state. Hitler's response to this event precipitated the Nazi-Ukrainian War of 1941 to 1944. This long conflict cost the Ukraine over 7 million of her citizens.

The Nazi imprisonment and murders of members of the Ukrainian Government and leaders of the Organization of Ukrainian Nationlists failed to crush the brave Ukrainian resistance. The nationalist in the Ukraine undertook a program of civil disobedience and resistance warfare which challenged the German occupation forces. The Ukrainian Insurgent Army forced the Nazi occupiers to retreat to heavily-defended garrisons. Large areas of the Ukraine came under the control of the Ukrainian Insurgent Army. As we all know, peace would not come to the Ukraine. The freedom-loving resistance fighters would soon turn their efforts against their Soviet oppressors.

The Soviets were forced to commit in excess of 1 million troops and police in their efforts to crush the Ukrainian Freedom Fighters. The Ukrainian Resistance was never defeated in a military sense, and they continued their struggle underground.

Today, over 47 million people suffer under Soviet domination in the Ukraine. While some progress has been made, they still have no assurances of civil or political rights. Another 2 million Ukrainians live in the United States where these descendants of a rich Ukrainian heritage hold high the beacon of liberty.

This is why the celebration of the 71st anniversary of Ukrainian independence is important to free men everywhere. Much remains to be done to bring true respect for human rights and true respect for legitimate national aspirations in the Ukraine. I salute the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America, Southeastern Michigan Branch, for their outstanding efforts on behalf of freedom and democracy.

POLICE CHIEF RETIRING

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to bring to your attention an individual who resides in the First Congressional District of New Jersey and is retiring after 30 years of service with the Gloucester Police Department. Chief Seth Stichler has spent the last 30 years actively involved in many areas of police work. He is past president of the prestigious N.J. State Chiefs of Police Association, the Camden County Chief of Police Association, as well as the South Jersey and American Legion Chiefs of Police Associations.

Seth has also served as emergency management coordinator from April 1985 to the present. It is apparent from his affiliations that he has taken his chosen vocation to heart and served the community well. Chief Stichler served in the U.S. Navy in the Pacific Islands from 1943 to 1950.

Certainly he is to be commended as a fine police officer. I ask you to join with me, his family, and friends in a salute to Chief Seth Stichler on the occasion of his retirement on February 3, 1989. His dedication and accomplishments have certainly set high standards for individuals who will seek law enforcement careers in the future.

GROWING PROBLEM OF FOREIGN INVESTMENT IN THE UNITED STATES

HON. JOHN BRYANT

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. BRYANT. Mr. Speaker, as you and the Members of the House well know I am very concerned about the growing problem of foreign investment in the United States and its impact upon our economic future. My immediate and particular concern, of course, is that we simply do not have adequate information on the scope and magnitude of foreign investment in our country which is the point of my legislation, H.R. 5, the Foreign Ownership Disclosure Act, requiring a reasonable disclosure of information concerning such investments.

Recently, I had the good fortune to address the convention of the Industrial Union Department [AFL-CIO] on this question. What I found among the IUD's leadership was a serious concern among America's industrial workers of the potential adverse impact of foreign investment on our industrial base, as well as its sometimes negative influence on labor-management relations.

Howard D. Samuel, president of the Industrial Union Department, has written a short article on "The Two Sides of Foreign Investment" which has appeared in a number of newspapers around the country. I would like to share President Samuel's article and his interesting perspective with my colleagues.

THE TWO SIDES OF FOREIGN INVESTMENT

(By Howard D. Samuel, President, Industrial Union Department (AFL-CIO))

The foreign investment issue has reached the TV screen and the editorial page. Presidential candidates discussed the problem; CBS's 60 Minutes and NBC's Today Show have put it up for debate.

Foreign investment in the U.S. is no longer an issue reserved for economists. Ordinary American workers and citizens are discussing it, and beginning to worry about it.

In terms of total American assets, foreigners still own only a tiny fraction. But in terms of specific sectors, they are reaching for dominance. Foreigners already control two industries, consumer electronics and cement, and are close to it in machine tools, chemicals, auto parts, and tires.

Foreigners own 20 percent of all American banking assets, and are heading for majority control of downtown real estate in Los Angeles, Houston and Washington, D.C.

It's a good deal for foreign investors. For a bunch of cheap dollars, they are buying into the largest consumer market in the world, into the most stable political system, and into the world's most advanced technology.

The United States isn't doing badly, either. Without foreign investment, particularly in government bonds, our budget deficits might have driven us into inflation and recession, if not actual bankruptcy.

The claim that direct foreign investment has also provided three million jobs is more dubious. It assumes that every dollar introduced into manufacturing produced a new job. Since most foreign money goes into existing businesses, the jobs numbers are probably inflated.

But there is a down side to growing foreign investment, and American workers and consumers should be aware of it.

In the first place, not all of the foreign investors have proved to be good guests. Since foreigners had very little to do with building the American economy, we have a right to expect them to respect our laws and customs when they venture here to take advantage of what others have built.

But that has not always been the case. Some companies such as BASF, the giant German chemical multinational, and Kawasaki, the Japanese motorcycle manufacture, and a number of others, have been fighting unionization—even where it already exists—and in some cases have been fined for violations of safety and health and environmental laws as well.

These are just two examples of a growing problem, made more ironic by the fact that most of the companies resisting unions in the United States have long records of collective bargaining and would not consider attacking trade unionism or violating environmental laws in their home countries.

That isn't the only problem. We are happy to have Japanese auto manufacturers set up shop and make cars and trucks in the U.S. rather than make them in Japan and export them to the U.S. (Why always to the U.S.? Because the Europeans keep a tight lid on imports.)

But then the Japanese also invite over their favorite parts suppliers to set up shop in the U.S., freezing out U.S. parts manufacturers. Profits to car manufacturers and parts suppliers both don't necessarily stay in the U.S., but are shipped back home.

Finally, we are concerned about the actions taken by foreign interests to protect their economic investments. During the 12 months of 1988, foreign countries and companies will have spent $100 million for lobbyists, lawyers and public relations experts to influence Congressional and executive department decisionmaking. This is not garden-variety talent; the foreigners have hired former members of Congress, former Cabinet members and White House aides, sometimes, as the Deaver case demonstrated, in violation of the law.

Foreign investors have every right to try to influence the U.S. government to protect their interests—although it couldn't happen in most other countries—but we ought to be aware that their motivation is not to enhance the national interests of the U.S. but the interests of their own country.

Does that mean that the American worker is retreating to an America-first state of mind? Not necessarily. It does mean that we are not quite as euphoric about foreign investment as the U.S. Chamber of Commerce or the Treasury Department, that we view the benefits of foreign investment with a skeptical eye.

It means we strongly support new ethics legislation which would limit the ability of high government officials to sell their expertise to foreign interests soon after leaving government employ. (Sometimes it seems the arrangements are initiated while the officials are still working for the U.S.)

It means we support legislation to improve our knowledge about foreign investment. No nation in the world is as loose as we are in regulating foreign investment in—and possible control of—our assets, and no nation is as careless in keeping records about it. We have no accurate record of the total amount of investment, and we know little about the activities of individual companies. That is why we support legislation like the Bryant amendment in the House to force greater disclosure and to improve our record-keeping.

In the meantime, American workers will continue to welcome foreign investors with controlled enthusiasm. We would rather have it than not have it, but we strongly support measures to make sure that we know more about it and that a fair share of the benefit remain in the U.S. We are not ready to become an economic colony of our trading partners.

MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR., NATIONAL HOLIDAY

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, I was particularly proud, once again, to join all Americans in honoring Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., on the occasion of the fourth national holiday commemorating his birthdate.

Dr. King's life and work inspire and uplift. His commitment to equality and justice is an example each of us—whatever our background or state in life—should emulate.

We as a Nation still have not entirely erased bigotry, hatred, and distrust. And economic analyses show sharp differentials in the earnings and employment outlook between the races. Yet, as Dr. King once said: "We must learn to live together as brothers or we shall all perish together as fools."

It behooves Americans to pull together, and one mechanism toward that laudable goal is the national holiday we celebrate in Dr. King's honor. We are afforded on this holiday a chance collectively to look back in time for advice and counsel on how to look forward together to a greater, more abundant America—an America where all people have the same chance to achieve excellence in a field of pursuit of his or her choice.

Admittedly, America has a long way to go before we reach this elusive but worthy goal, but it has come a far distance toward it.

As Dr. King once said, "if you can't fly, run. If you can't run, walk. If you can't walk, crawl. But by all means keep on moving." So, as we move beyond this 1989 celebration of Dr. King's birthday, let us pledge to move toward a society in which all are created equally and all are measured solely "by the content of their character."

LEGISLATION DESIGNATING ENGLISH AS OFFICIAL LANGUAGE OF UNITED STATES

HON. NORMAN D. SHUMWAY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to amend the Constitution to designate English as the official language of the United States.

The purpose of the amendment is simple: To provide our common language with a measure of legal protection which it now enjoys as a result of custom only. English is the common glue which has forged unity and strength from our rich cultural diversity. In my view, it is the primary language in which our Government should continue to function. However, without that missing measure of legal protection, I believe that the primacy of English is being threatened.

I don't believe in English only. I do believe in English primarily, and certainly I believe it is incumbent upon the Government to take steps to protect that primacy. I cherish our cultural diversity, but I also cherish our common bond of language.

In the November election, the success of three State initiatives provided further evidence of growing support for the English language amendment. With those successes in Florida, Colorado, and Arizona, a total of 17 States have officially designated English as our national language. Only 23 States have the initiative process. My own State of California previously approved an English language initiative by 73 percent.

It has become increasingly obvious to me that opponents to the bill have no substantive arguments to present. Instead, they rely upon unfounded, highly emotional accusations. For example, they warn that the English language amendment would deny due process to language minorities in the courts. Predictions were made that individuals not fluent in English would be unable to obtain emergency medical care, or assistance in any acute crisis. Still another argument alleged that my amendment would prevent communicating with language minorities in other languages, and would deny educational opportunities to immigrants.

While every one of those attacks is frivolous and untrue, they all continue to circulate. In an effort to terminate these criticisms, I am introducing a revised version of the English language amendment. It states in clear and straighforward terms that the measure will have absolutely no negative effect on educational opportunity, the learning of a foreign language, protection of the public health and safety, or the availability of translators for litigants, defendants, or witnesses in court cases.

The most commonly asked question about the English language amendment is, Why do we need it? We need it to provide English with legal protection as our national language, thereby continuing our heritage as a unilingual nation. We need it to end conflicting Government policies and signals being sent to language minorities. We need it to prevent the divisiveness that is bound to result from a plurality of official languages. We need it to ensure that our Government continues to function primarily in English. And, most importantly, we need it to ensure that newcomers to our shores gain fluency in English—fluency which, in turn, is the door to opportunity.

With the red herring arguments effectively addressed, I don't believe opponents of the English language amendment will have a convincing statement to make. My bill is not an effort to restrict private choice—it is, instead, an effort to clarify public policy, and to offer the full measure of America's opportunity to every newcomer. What could be more fair—or more American—than that?

I appreciate the support of the many original cosponsors joining me today, and strongly urge my colleagues who are not yet sponsors to join with me in this effort.

TRIBUTE TO JIMMY JAMES

HON. MARTIN FROST

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, few circumstances of war can be worse than being a prisoner in a foreign nation's camp, particularly one with the brutal character of the Japanese prisoner-of-war camps of the Second World War.

Christmas of 1942 was particularly severe on our men held by the Japanese, as it was the low point of our military presence in the South Pacific.

The North China marines, men captured at Wake Island, Shanghai, and Tientsin, remember the physical and mental torture of spending those days under Japanese guard.

But, they also remember Jimmy James, who now resides in my congressional district. They remember Jimmy James because Jimmy James remembered them.

And, remember them he did—in grand fashion.

Mr. Speaker, the Canton, OH, newspaper, the Repository, has chronicled the generous life of Jimmy James, and I believe the American people would like to know of the Christmas of 1942 and how the North China marines came to honor Jimmy James.

Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to honor Mr. Jimmy James by inserting the text of the article in the Repository, with the admiration of us all for this 87-year-old patriot.

YULETIDE MIRACLE IN SHANGHAI—MARINES BRING PROVIDER OF LIFE-SAVING CHRISTMAS FEAST FROM TEXAS TO NORTH CANTON REUNION

(By Jim Hillibish)

Jimmy James is a little guy. You've seen his type behind lunch counters. A wry smile. A quick eye. A big belt buckle. A fast right that flips eggs and steak in one spatula slide.

Jimmy James beat the Japanese Imperial Army with his cooking.

In early December 1941, the North China U.S. Marines got their marching orders. They'd been guarding American embassies in Peking, Tienstin and Ching Tao. All 202, including Frank Prater, now of North Canton, were to be withdrawn Dec. 10 from Japanese occupied China to the Philippines.

On Dec. 7, Admiral Isoroku Yamamoto blew apart Pearl Harbor. The North China Marines were instant prisoners of war.

In Shanghai, that sharp little cookie flaying hash and cracking eggs behind the counter was Jimmy James, the only American restaurateur thereabouts. Steak and eggs, doughnuts, ham, hamburgers, you name it, you got it in Jimmy's Lunch. Hot. In American.

And pie, 75 a day.

Jimmy James, of Jackson Minn., had joined the Army and went to China in 1920. He requested duty in northern China because "I'd heard it got cold enough there to ice skate."

The young man, still not shaving regularly, got out in '22 with $400 in savings. He knew Chinese. He hung around. After toiling in construction and as a night jailer in a lockup for foreigners, he figured "why not." He unveiled a hamburger stand in downtown Shanghai.

"The place took off. Seventy percent of our trade was Chinese," he said.

He opened two Jimmy's Lunch spots, and a dinner-dance hall called St. George's. By the mid-1930s, Jimmy was riding a crest of fried chicken and mashed potatoes.

Almost everything changed in '37. "The Japanese invaded. But for some reason, they still let me run my restaurants," he said. Jimmy James gets his way.

Jimmy knew nothing of the 1,550 American and British servicemen, including the North China Marines, imprisoned in Shanghai. Frank Prater was there: "For us, it was the bottom of the barrel. We were starved. It was very brutal. Many of our men were killed by guards for nothing. We lost 30 percent."

And they lost hope. All they knew was the United States had been dealt a terrible, probably fatal, defeat. Breaking hope is the way to brainwash POWs. The Japanese knew this.

Then came a boast in a Japanese-controlled newspaper. "Hordes of defeated American, British POWs in Shanghai Prison." Jimmy James read it over his lunch counter. His teeth clenched.

An angry man fights best with what he knows best. Jimmy knew food. He asked the Japanese command if he could bring over a little something, you know, for Christmas. Some of the Japanese were Christian. A miracle happened. They agreed.

How the following really happened nobody but Jimmy knows. He kind of winks at it, matter-of-factly.

In a week, in famine-wracked China, Jimmy James found and roasted 350 turkeys with dressing and sweet potatoes. He came up with hundreds of mince pies. He located candy by the boxful. He dug up 1,550 American Christmas cards, and a group of American women, including nuns, to sign them. He fashioned Christmas decorations. He cut down a pine tree. He made 7,750 cups of coffee.

Jimmy's convoy pulled up to Shanghai prison on Dec. 25, 1942. The Japanese were so shocked, they simply opened the gates. That's easier than reneging a deal struck with Jimmy James.

"It was funny," Prater recalls. "We'd heard crazy rumors of something coming. We had absolutely nothing decent to eat for a year. We were malnourished. We were beaten. The Far East was down the drain. . .

"'I'll believe it when I see it. And who the hell is this Jimmy James, anyway?,' we all thought."

Words can't describe it. Faces still do. The feast—"We can taste it like yesterday." The signed cards—"We were speechless. American women!"

The Japanese imprisoned Jimmy, separate from the Marines of course, but under the same conditions. "I'd fantasize about throwing away scraps of an order of steak from the restaurant," Jimmy said.

For the Marines, it only got worse. They were shipped to northern Japan. They were enslaved in deep coal mines. Many more died. It went on until the war ended in 1945.

Jimmy was released in '45 and reclaimed his restaurants. That lasted until the communists took over in 1948. He says he lost "everything but a dollar."

The dollar paid off. He invented a dish that made him the "chili-rice king" of Texas. At age 87, he's on TV, ice skating and ballroom dancing.

The North China Marines figured this legend called Jimmy James couldn't possibly have survived his tormentors. Years later, one of them walked into a chili-rice joint in Tyler, Texas. He looked at the little guy behind the counter. It clicked. "You're Jimmy James, aren't you." You bet your chili-rice.

Jimmy took the train from Dallas into town last week. He was a guest of the 87 surviving North China Marines. No way around it. They ordered him to come to the reunion at the Prater house in North Canton and the Holiday Inn Belden Village. They owed him a meal.

War is a strange thing. Such adversity creates bonds only veterans understand. You see it in their handshakes and in their eyes. "You know, there's always some good in bad," Jimmy says.

These ex-POWs say Jimmy's feast pulled them through. In the darkest hours in the blackest of enemy coal mines, they savored the flavor of Christmas Day 1942. Forty-six years later and they're still not over it.

"They could kick the hell out of us, but we knew some guy cared. Guys who gave up hope never got out alive. Jimmy gave us our only hope," Prater says.

James James winks at that.

NO GAS TAX INCREASE FOR DEFICIT REDUCTION

HON. JOHN P. HAMMERSCHMIDT

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, today I join the esteemed chairman of the Public Works and Transportation Committee, Mr. GLENN ANDERSON, and the ranking Republican member of the Surface Transportation Subcommittee, Mr. BUD SHUSTER in cosponsoring a resolution to oppose the use of Federal gasoline and diesel taxes for deficit reduction. This resolution will be one of the most important initiatives of the 101st Congress, and I urge my colleagues to join with us and our many original cosponsors in preventing this detrimental increase from ever being enacted.

The 9-cent Federal gas tax is earmarked for the Federal highway trust fund. These moneys, with State contributions, finance our Nation's highways and mass transit systems. The American public has accepted the concept that those who use the roads should pay for them. This State and Federal partnership has been highly successful, producing the finest transportation system in the world. Over 2 trillion miles are driven on U.S. roads annually. Roads in the United States carry 89.7 percent of all personal travel and 85 percent of the dollar value of everything grown, manufactured, and produced. An increase in the gasoline tax which is not used for transportation needs not only unfairly burdens a limited segment of the population, but it will cripple our infrastructure by reducing funds available at both the Federal and State level.

An increase in the existing gasoline and diesel fuel tax for deficit reduction would have a serious negative effect on the economy. The tax would be inflationary in that it would affect transportation costs all across the United States which would be passed on to the consumer in higher prices for goods and services. In turn, these increases would decrease our gross national product and ability to compete in international markets.

The majority of automobile travel by American families is to earn a living. This is not frivolous, luxury travel which can be easily curtailed. Why should the drivers of America, many of those who drive for a living, be forced to bear the burden of the deficit on their shoulders? An increase would be regressive and impact the poor much harder than others. In addition, drivers in many Western and Southern States and in rural communities use much more gasoline than residents of Eastern States and urban areas. The deficit burden simply would not be distributed equitably throughout the Nation and across all levels of income. A Washington Post-ABC News poll found that 73 percent of Americans oppose raising gasoline taxes to balance the budget. Another poll by Newsweek found that 77 percent of U.S. citizens oppose such an increase. The American people have spoken. As their Representatives in the Congress, let us echo their voices and take a strong stand against this prejudicial and onerous idea.

The budget deficit is a legitimate problem, but an increase in the gas tax is not the correct solution. I urge all of my colleagues to join with me in opposition to any efforts to increase the gasoline and diesel fuels tax for deficit reduction purposes.

DESIGNATING APRIL 1989 AS NATIONAL BARBERSHOP QUARTET MONTH

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation designating the month of April 1989 as "National Barbershop Quartet Month."

Barbershop harmony is a style of unaccompanied singing with three voices harmonizing to the melody. The voice parts are called tenor, lead, baritone, and bass. Characteristically, the lead sings the melody and the tenor provides the high range, the bass provides the lower range and the baritone completes the balance of the chord harmoniously. The style is distinguished by uniformity of word sounds with a special emphasis on close harmony.

Mr. Speaker, the expressions, "Barbershop music" and "Barbershop harmony" survive from an English expression where, during the 16th, 17th, and early 18th centuries, the barbershop was a regular haunt for music while customers awaited service.

The first American barbers' music was probably strummed and vocalized in the South, where a light-hearted, socially oriented society provided the ideal atmosphere for the planting of a seed of harmony that was eventually destined to sprout in all areas of the continent.

Mr. Speaker, the barbershop quartet played an important role in the beginning of an industry that was fated to expand into one of America's most enterprising establishments. Barbershop quartets sing about human interest in love, politics, war, habits and traditions, heroes, villians, slang, and everyday diversions.

In April 1938, the "Society for the Preservation and Propogation of Barbershop Quartet Singing in the United States" was born. This year marks the 51st anniversary of the society during the month of April. Mr. Speaker, barbershop quartet singing, as a hobby and means of individual self-expression, has preserved cherished songs for the ages. For all of these reasons, I have introduced this legislation to commemorate this true American art form.

THE 100TH ANNIVERSARY OF JACOBSON & CO.

HON. MATTHEW J. RINALDO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Speaker, on February 26, 1989, Jacobson & Co. in Elizabeth, NJ, will celebrate its 100th anniversary.

Gustave Jacobson founded the company in 1889 which began as a small plastering contracting firm. The company quickly ascended to ornamental and decorative plastering and became the leading producer of ornamentation.

In the early days of the company, Jacobson plaster ornamentation was applied to such famous buildings as the Metropolitan Museum of Art, the Presidential Palace in Cuba, and the Hearst Castle in San Simeon, CA, as well as many large theaters around the world.

When ornamental design went out of style, the company became a pioneer in the architectural acoustics field, and today, Jacobson is recognized as the premier ceiling contractor in the Metropolitan New York market. The Trump Tower, American Express Tower, Rainbow Room, windows of the World Restaurant at the World Trade Center are just a few of the major buildings which carry the Jacobson mark of exellence.

After 100 years Jacobson & Co. is still a family-operated company, currently managed by members of the family's fourth generation, John and Neal Jacobson. Several fifth-generation family members are also contributing to the company's second century of craftsmanship.

I am proud to salute Jacobson & Co. on its first 100 years and extend best wishes for another century as a successful small business in my congressional district.

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT SHOULD PAY ITS FAIR SHARE TO COUNTIES

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today a bill to increase Federal payments-in-lieu-of-taxes to counties and other units of local government. This legislation is badly needed to make sure that local governments do not suffer when the Federal Government acquires local property and takes it off the tax rolls.

My bill addresses two different payment-in-lieu-of-taxes [PILT] programs. The first is administered by the Bureau of Land Management [BLM] and makes payments for land held by a wide variety of Federal agencies, including the Bureau of Reclamation, the National Park Service, the Forest Service, and the Army Corps of Engineers. This program has been almost fully funded in recent years, but the payment formulas are too low to begin with, leaving local governments short.

The second program is the Refuge Revenue Sharing Program run by the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service. This program has adequate payment formulas, but unfortunately has been funded at only about 60 percent of the full obligations in recent years. As a result, counties and other jurisdictions which have private land acquired by the Federal Government find that the payments are substantially less than would have been paid in local taxes had the land stayed in private hands.

These problems have caused substantial hardship for counties and their residents, including school boards. When the Federal Government acquires property, local governments must increase the tax burden on everyone else to make up for what the Federal Government is not paying. Consequently, there is growing public resistance to government acquisition of land in many parts of my State, and probably in other parts of the country, as well.

My bill addresses this problem from several angles. First, the bill amends the BLM's payment formula to provide a payment of three-fourths of 1 percent of appraised value, if that is greater than the existing payments options. This formula is currently provided in the Refuge Program, so my bill simply puts the two formulas on a par. However, to address a concern voiced by some, the bill also limits the payment under this formula to no more than would have been received had the land been subject to local property taxes.

Second, the bill indexes for inflation the payment formula options based on a flat rate. For example, both the BLM and the Refuge Programs provide a payment option equal to 75 cents per acre. Over time, however, the value of this option will erode with inflation, so the bill would require an annual adjustment of this payment rate to reflect inflation as measured by the producer price index for finished goods.

Finally, the bill would solve the problem of inadequate funding for the Refuge Program by simply requiring that the necessary funds be spent.

Mr. Speaker, this is an issue of increasing importance to local governments and jurisdictions, especially in rural areas. North Dakota has the greatest number of national wildlife refuges in the country, as well as vast areas in national grasslands. Most North Dakotans do not mind preserving these natural areas for the benefit of the country, but it should not be to the detriment of the ability of the local government to function.

A key to rural development is to see that county governments, local school boards, and others have the revenues they need and deserve to build and maintain roads, educate their children, offer social services, et cetera. In other words, we need to maintain and improve the quality of life and the business climate so that new businesses will locate in rural areas and present businesses will stay.

I urge my colleagues to support this legislation to give county and other local government jurisdictions their fair share for lands acquired by the Federal Government.

ASSURE TIMELY DELIVERY OF CIVIL SERVICE, RAILROAD, AND MILITARY RETIREMENT, AND BLACK LUNG BENEFIT CHECKS

HON. BERNARD J. DWYER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. DWYER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, today I am reintroducing a package of four bills to ensure the timely delivery of Federal pension checks to railroad retirees, military retirees, civil service annuitants, and recipients of black lung benefits. This is the same legislation I introduced at the end of the 100th Congress.

Currently, the post office receives benefit checks on a specified date, usually the first or third of the month. In the event the date of disbursement falls on a Saturday, Sunday, or a holiday, the post office will deliver the checks on the next available business day. As a result, retirees many times must wait several days before they receive their checks. In some instances, these checks have already been delivered several days in advance to the Postal Service, which must then hold them until the designated date of delivery. For those individuals who depend on their monthly checks as their sole source of income, this delay can pose an unnecessary hardship.

As a result, in 1977 Congress approved Public Law 95-216, which included a provision to provide for the early delivery of Social Security benefit checks whenever the regular delivery date for payment of either Social Security or supplemental security income checks falls on a Saturday, Sunday, or a legal public holiday. Unfortunately, Congress never extended this courtesy to the 4.4 million recipients of civil service, railroad, and military retirement benefits, and black lung benefits.

My legislative package would simply assure other Federal retirees the same treatment already afforded to recipients of Social Security benefits. Under my legislation, railroad retirees, military retirees, civil service annuitants, and recipients of black lung benefits would be assured early delivery of their benefit checks in the event the day regularly designated for delivery falls on a weekend or a legal public holiday. Thus my legislation would place this smaller group of retirees on equal footing with recipients of Social Security benefits. I urge my colleagues to support this long overdue legislation.

GLOBAL POVERTY REDUCTION ACT

HON. JOHN MILLER

OF WASHINGTON

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Speaker, today I join my colleague, Congressman MEL LEVINE in reintroducing the Global Poverty Reduction Act. Despite the name, this bill is a practical, pragmatic approach to mitigating the seemingly intractable poverty in the developing world.

At the end of the last term, this bill had 194 cosponsors in the House and 27 in the Senate. It also had the support of more than 70 private groups. Last term, in introducing this bill, I said it was time to inject some accountability into our foreign economic aid programs. This is true now more than ever. It is time the American taxpayer has some idea what is to be accomplished with their tax dollars. It is time we had some measurable standards of success in achieving these goals.

Mr. Speaker, there is no greater goal, no better use of our development aid dollars than helping to lift the world's children out of the life threatening morass of poverty and illiteracy that engulfs much of the developing world.

This bill would establish standards by which we can measure the effectiveness of our foreign aid programs in achieving these goals. That is good news for the American taxpayer who foots the bill for these programs and good news for the world's poorest people who will benefit from this increased effectiveness.

The bill calls for U.S. foreign development aid to contribute measurably to eradicating absolute poverty in the developing world by advancing specific antipoverty goals including:

A mortality rate for children under 5 years of age no greater than 70 per 1,000;

A female literacy rate of 80 percent;

Not more than 20 percent of the world's population living below the absolute poverty level.

The legislation asks the administration to consult with host country governments, nongovernmental and international organizations to develop and implement a plan that coordinates U.S. foreign development aid to achieve these and other established antipoverty goals by the year 2000.

This in not impractical, utopian "feel good policy." These are attainable goals. For example, according to UNICEF, in 1960, 74 countries had an under 5 mortality rate above 170. Today that figure is down to 33 countries. This will focus our attention on what we are doing right, so we can do more of it.

Mr. Speaker, from the standpoint of economic self-interest, strategic importance and moral leadership, U.S. foreign economic aid—which now accounts for only four-fifths of 1 percent of the Federal budget—can be one of the most effective uses of our tax dollars.

In underdeveloped countries, U.S. economic aid can help strengthen fragile economies, foster self-sufficiency, and encourage the shift away from inefficient centralized economies and toward free enterprise. As these economies develop so do their consumer markets. In the long run, appropriate U.S. aid programs can help nations that were once economic basket cases, wholly dependent on Western donors, become instead, our trading partners, providing important markets for American goods and services.

We also enhance our own security by using U.S. foreign aid programs to encourage the emergence of stable, entrepreneurial, economies. Nations with stable economies which share our free market values are also far more likely to share our democratic political values.

The well spring of economic prosperity is individual initiative. This same initiative invariably spurs political self-determination. As we have seen recently in South Korea, the more broadly prosperous a nation becomes, the more adamant will be the demands of its people for genuine democratic institutions—a free press, freedom to associate, to organize and dissent.

And the proliferation of free-market, democratic societies in the world is our greatest defense against the expansionist totalitarianism of Marxist-Leninist nations.

Finally, foreign aid like the child survival programs and famine relief efforts are more than simple charity. By supporting these programs we as a nation say to the world, there is one standard of decency, one standard of compassion for all members of the human community. And no accident of birth should condemn a child to death.

Unfortunately, our foreign economic aid programs have, too often, done little more than line the pockets of friendly despots. Or these programs have funded grandiose, inappropriate development projects which did little to benefit the world's poorest people. A blanket indictment of all foreign aid, however, throws the baby out with the bath water; precluding thoughtful analysis of the problem and preventing the implementation of effective, cost-efficient programs.

Most Members of Congress have heard the question from their constituent, "why are we so concerned about giving to Third World countries, and not to our own?" the answer is, of course, that the health and well-being of our own citizens has always, and will always, have the first claim on Federal resources.

But this Nation cannot be an island of prosperity in a sea of poverty, for we will inevitably be swept away with the tide. And to enjoy the blessings of liberty, we must exercise the responsibilities of freedom. We neglect these responsibilities at our own peril.

IN HONOR OF WALTER J. WARREN OF BAYSIDE, CA

HON. DOUGLAS H. BOSCO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. BOSCO. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Walter J. Warren of Bayside, CA, and to urge my colleagues to join me in recognizing Mr. Warren's achievement of 50 years of continuous membership and perfect attendance at the Rotary Club of Arcata, CA.

Walter Warren has long been involved in community and civic affairs in northern California. He joined the Arcata Rotary Club on January 27, 1939, and he and his wife Holly are about to celebrate their 53d wedding anniversary.

Mr. Speaker, I send my very best wishes to Walter Warren, his family, and his friends on this special occasion. I also send my regards to the members of the Arcata Rotary Club, who will honor Walter Warren for his half century of contributions and accomplishments on January 28, 1989.

ANNIVERSARY OF UKRAINIAN NATIONAL REPUBLIC

HON. DAVID E. BONIOR

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. BONIOR. Mr. Speaker, this coming Sunday, January 22, 1989, Ukrainians around the world, and particularly in the 12th Congressional District of Michigan, will commemorate the 71st anniversary of the creation of the democratic Ukrainian National Republic. On that same day, Ukrainians will also observe the 70th anniversary of the Act of Union whereby all Ukrainian lands were united into one independent and sovereign state of the Ukrainian nation.

That young nation, however, was subjected to attacks from Communist forces and fell victim to Soviet imperialism. Although the Ukrainian National Republic was recognized as independent by a number of nations, the Communist government in Moscow relentlessly assailed the young republic. By 1920, the independent government could no longer withstand the pressure of Communist aggression. A puppet government was installed in Ukraine which then became known as the "Ukrainian Soviet Socialists Republic," and incorporated into the Union of Soviet Socialists Republics [U.S.S.R.] without the support or consent of the Ukrainian people.

From that time on, the Ukrainian people have struggled to shed themselves of a government imposed upon them by Russian Communists—a government, Mr. Speaker, which has continuously sought to crush the Ukrainian national identity and wipe the existence of Ukrainian culture off the face of the Earth. The evidence of this effort stains the history of the Soviet Union. One has to recall mass exterminations in the 1920's, induced famines in the 1930's, and Stalinist terror in the 1940's, and most recently the bureaucratic and regulatory carelessness which resulted in the Chernobyl disaster in the 1980's. The Soviets have pursued a comprehensive strategy to suffocate the rich cultural, religious, social, and democratic fabric that binds the Ukrainian nation.

Millions of Ukrainians have lost their lives to this struggle which continues to this day. Arrests, trials, and convictions of hundreds of Ukrainian intellectuals charged with "anti-Soviet propaganda and agitations" are commonplace. These nationalists fight against the abuses of the Soviet Government, its multiple violations of human rights, and its despicable police rule. Because they seek to protect their countrymen from a constant barrage of harassment from the Moscow government, their voices are muffled or silenced. The names include Lukyanenko, Svitlychny, Shukhevych, Chernovol, Goring, and Gell, among hundreds of others.

These patriots battle against Russification whereby the Russian Communists are trying to crush the cultural identity of Ukraine in the hope that this will quell the thirst for freedom of the Ukrainian people. Though the Soviets may outlaw traditional religions, burn libraries, and forbid the speaking of the Ukrainian language, they cannot crush the will of the Ukraine to once again be a free and independent nation. Try as they might, Mr. Speaker, the hope of freedom burns brightly inside of each Ukrainian, be they in Ukraine or anywhere else in the world.

Mr. Speaker, January 22 is a very special day, for on it we pause to think of the vibrant struggle for independence which goes on each day halfway around the world in Ukraine. I urge my colleagues and all Americans to reflect on this ongoing struggle and lend their moral support to the Ukrainian people in their quest to be among the family of free nations.

THE CONGRESSIONAL PAY REFORM ACT

HON. THOMAS J. TAUKE

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. TAUKE. Mr. Speaker, given that the 101st Congress is the "Bicentennial Congress," it is entirely fitting that we should address the controversial issue of congressional pay increases.

During the first session of Congress, Members debated the issue of congressional pay and the manner in which increases should be determined. In fact, in 1789, 1 of the proposed 12 amendments to the Constitution stated:

> No law varying the compensation of the Senators and Representatives shall take effect until an election of Representatives shall have intervened.

As everyone is aware, 10 of these amendments became the Bill of Rights, but 2 of them, including the pay resolution, failed to win the necessary support in three-fourths of the States.

On January 3, I reintroduced the Congressional Pay Reform Act, a measure I originally introduced in 1979. In nearly every Congress over the past decade, Members have been embarrassed by the controversy which surrounds congressional pay adjustments. Things have gotten so bad that the American people believe Congress is incapable of dealing with salary adjustments in other than a chaotic and complicated manner. And they may be right.

The Congressional Pay Reform Act mandates three simple, yet important, reforms in the way we consider our salaries. Under this bill, congressional pay adjustments would be deferred until an election had intervened and the next Congress was seated, thus preventing us from voting for a pay raise which would go into effect during our current term of office.

Second, recorded votes would be required in both the House and Senate so that the public would know how each elected official stood on salary issues. In the past, many pay raises were approved by anonymous vote.

Finally, congressional pay questions would be considered independently of other appropriations bills, thus ending the current practice of combining congressional salary increases with adjustments for Federal employees and agency appropriations. This bill would free the question of salary adjustments from the entanglements of other appropriations bills and would prevent Federal agency appropriations from being held hostage to congressional pay increases. Moreover, automatic cost-of-living increases would not accrue to Members, and future increases for other governmental officials would not be tied to congressional pay increases.

Furthermore, this legislation would not only prevent Members from voting for a pay increase for themselves during their current term of office, it would also require each Member to take a public stand on this issue. At the very least, we owe this to our constituents.

Congressional pay adjustments seem to have become a perpetual source of debate, controversy, and embarrassment. The Congressional Pay Reform Act is an important step toward providing us with a simple, yet effective, way to equitably deal with this issue and help prevent the interruption of the normal operation of the Federal Government.

IRAN-CONTRA RULING

HON. CARROLL HUBBARD, JR.

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues an article I read with interest which was written by two outstanding Washington attornerys, James Hamilton and Mary Albert. Jim Hamilton is a partner and Mary Albert is an associate in the Washington, DC, office of Olwine, Connelly, Chase, O'Donnell & Weyher.

The article appeared in the November 14, 1988, issue of Legal Times and is entitled, "Iran-Contra Ruling: Immunity's Limits."

I hope my colleagues will find the article as informative as I did.

The article follows:

IRAN-CONTRA RULING: IMMUNITY'S LIMITS

(By James Hamilton and Mary Albert)

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit recently declined to disturb the ruling by Judge Gerhard Gessell that the Iran-Contra trials may proceed, despite claims by three defendants that their immunized congressional testimony irrevocably tainted the criminal proceedings against them. But the issues raised by the defendants, Lt. Col. Oliver North, Rear Adm. John Poindexter, and arms dealer Albert Hakim—and by their ardent supporter, the American Civil Liberties Union—deserve a second look.

Using the federal immunity statute, Congress can obtain an order compelling testimony from a witness who asserts his Fifth Amendment privilege to remain silent. Neither a defendant's immunized testimony nor the fruits of that testimony, however, can be used against the defendant in a criminal proceeding. A prosecutor has the "heavy burden" of proving that this has not occurred.

The immunity contentions of the three Iran-Contra defendants were sweeping. Their able lawyers asserted in joint papers that, "given the widespread dissemination of immunized testimony [for example, by the grand jury, witnesses before it, and the staff of Independent Counsel Lawrence Walsh] has been inevitable, undeniable, and so pervasive that the indictments must be dismissed as a matter of law."

CASE AS "OMELET"?

They claimed further that "immunized testimony would inevitably be used against them during pretrial proceedings and at trial" because jurors and witnesses have been exposed to this testimony. "In short," they argued, "this case is an omelet from which the tainted immunized testimony can never be unscrambled."

Adopting the defendants' argument would mean that a congressional committee could never receive immunized testimony in widely televised matters, like Watergate or Iran-Contra, without ineluctably tainting subsequent criminal trials. For a court to hold this would be to concede that the judiciary is powerless to devise lawful proceedings once Congress, using immunized testimony, has exercised its important constitutional right to inform itself and the public of corruption and wrongdoing in the federal government.

Gesell wisely did not so rule. Rather, he reached a preliminary decision that the cases should proceed to trial because "[n]o improper evidentiary use of the immunized testimony has appeared." More specifically, he made the following findings, which defendants vigorously challenged in the Court of Appeals:

The defendants' immunized testimony was not submitted to the grand jury in any form.

The grand jurors were "effectively" warned not to read about or listen to immunized testimony, and this testimony played no part in the grand jury's unanimous decision to indict.

No grand-jury testimony or exhibits became known to Independent Counsel Walsh from either the immunized congressional testimony or its fruits.

Walsh and the other prosecuting attorneys have not read the immunized testimony.

Walsh's staff was legitimately aware of the "essential documents" and all "significant witnesses" and had been in direct contact with these witnesses long before the defendants gave immunized testimony.

Walsh at all times proceeded in good faith and took "strenuous precautions," at great inconvenience and expense, to safeguard the defendants' Fifth Amendment rights.

TRIVIAL EXPOSURE NOT FATAL

Significantly, Gesell dismissed the defendants' claims that a case is tainted if a prosecutor, juror, or witness is merely exposed to immunized testimony. He said:

"Defendants in their zeal treat this as if even the tiniest exposure to a witness or grand juror constituted exposure to an incurable disease. Such is clearly not the case. Exposure to a fleeting snippet means nothing. It has no evidentiary coherence or impact."

"Even more significant exposure is trivial where the fact is already known through independent evidence. Surely the law is built at least partly on common sense, and it cannot be—contrary to defendants' assertions otherwise—that a prosecutor who inadvertently overhears mention of a fact already confirmed by his own independent investigation can be said to have made a prohibited use of immunized testimony."

Gesell also concluded that there is no taint if a witness possessing independent knowledge somehow has his memory refreshed by immunized testimony. "If testimony remains truthful," he wrote, "the refreshment itself is not [a prohibited] evidentiary use." This conclusion has come under particular attack by the defendants.

Gesell did, however, make one crucial ruling that gives Walsh heartburn. There must be, the judge said, a separate trial for each defendant. Otherwise, an irreconcilable conflict might result between a defendant's due-process right to use the immunized testimony of another defendant—for example, in cross-examination—and the right of that other defendant to prevent his immunized testimony from being used against him.

The core of Gesell's pragmatic rulings, which have significant ramifications for the interworkings of government, is this: As long as prosecutors exercise extraordinary care—and Walsh is repeatedly praised for doing this—well-publicized, immunized congressional testimony will not doom the subsequent criminal trials of those compelled to give that testimony.

The last word on this issue has not been written; both Gesell and the Court of Appeals have recognized that facts yet to be developed may demonstrate that the proceedings are tainted. But Gesell's central conclusion should remain intact, for to reject it would seriously restrict the power of Congress to probe or would leave the courts wholly unable to try a defendant who has given widely disseminated immunized testimony.

"VOLUNTEERED" STATEMENTS

There is another immunity contention that the Iran-Contra prosecutors have advanced. Their argument, on which Gesell has not finally ruled, could also have widespread, unfortunate consequences if adopted.

Walsh's advocate for immunity issues, Herbert Stern—like Walsh, a former U.S. district judge—has contended that only compelled testimony is immunized by the statute and that any volunteered testimony before the Iran-Contra committees is not immunized. Indeed, Stern argued that "volunteered testimony, and leads therefrom, are usable even where [witnesses] do no more than repeat previously compelled testimony." He also asserted that volunteered testimony acts to waive a witness's Fifth Amendment privilege about the subject at issue and that even compelled testimony thereafter is not immunized.

It may be, to pick a fanciful example, that if North, called to testify about the Iran-Contra affair, voluntarily revealed his role in the Watergate break-in, that testimony would not be immunized. If sensible results are to be reached, however, any testimony about the announced subject of the hearing, the Iran-Contra affair, should be immunized. In a very real sense, North and his compatriots were compelled to come before the committees to tell all they knew about that topic.

Any other conclusion might put an intolerable burden on a congressional witness and his counsel. Some witnesses begin with a prepared statement, as they are allowed to do by the rules of various committees. Pursuant to an immunity order in 1973. John Dean III droned on before the Senate Watergate committee for about six hours. Such a statement is not normally given in response to specific questions; Dean began his prepared remarks after Chief Counsel Samuel Dash said only. "Mr. Dean, you have a statement you wish to present to the committee." If Stern's contention is accepted, that statement might be considered largely volunteered and thus not fully immunized.

Even in answering specific questions, witnesses often refer to earlier responses for context or clarity. A rule that such "volunteered" testimony is not immunized—or that voluntarily repeating prior testimony waives the Fifth Amendment privilege so that subsequent testimony is not immunized—would turn costive even the most garrulous witness.

Another likely result would be that counsel for congressional witnesses—particularly those of vocal nature, like some who appeared before the Iran-Contra panels—would become even more combative and intrusive in protecting their clients. In short, if the rule Stern advocates is adopted in its broadest form. Congress' investigatory procedures would be harmed, and the amount and usefulness of immunized testimony would dwindle.

SIGNIFICANT CONTRIBUTIONS OF CENTER FOR BUSINESS AND ENTREPRENEURIAL MANAGEMENT AT ST. MARY'S COLLEGE, WINONA, MN

HON. TIMOTHY J. PENNY

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. PENNY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to share with my colleagues news of the important work being done by the nonprofit Center for Business and Entrepreneurial Management at St. Mary's College in Winona, MN.

Though only in existence since September 1987, the center, under the direction of Brother Herman E. Zaccarelli and James M. Bedtke, MBA, has made several significant contributions to the betterment of the public and private sectors.

Specifically, I would like to mention three of the center's undertakings that are particularly noteworthy.

The first is the development of external business and entrepreneurial education for small businesses throughout the Nation. The center has developed a series of educational materials of over 50 booklets under the title of "Contemporary Management Series."

A second activity of the center is the creation and dissemination of a free, 52-point guide entitled, "The Checklist for Management Success in a Multi-Ethnic Business Environment."

In the business world, one of the foremost challenges facing executives and entrepreneurs is to integrate people of varied cultural backgrounds into a cohesive work force. This checklist helps to focus the employer's attention on the differing attitudes that individuals have regarding group participation, and suggests positive steps that can be taken to improve performance and enhance the employee's self-esteem.

A third major endeavor of the center is the development of a comprehensive program to support local communities that wish to advance their tourism business.

The first step in this process was the creation of a free checklist, "Welcome to Our Town: Guidelines for Establishing a Successful Tourism Program." This unique checklist explains how to conduct professional hotel occupancy and ZIP Code studies, and how to use this information to develop special events and imaginative promotions that will attract the tourist trade.

The Winona Convention and Visitors Bureau works in partnership with the Center for Business and Entrepreneurial Management in collecting and analyzing research of a community's visitor base. This helps to develop more targeted marketing programs resulting in careful allocation of human and financial resources in order to achieve the highest return on investment. That translates into a greater impact on the local economy. The Center for Business and Entrepreneurial Management provides an outside source for obtaining this information on tourism industry trends.

Mr. Speaker, it is important and appropriate that we recognize the diligent efforts of our educators, such as those at the Center for Business and Entrepreneurial Management at St. Mary's College of Minnesota, who are going beyond the campus to offer solutions to the problems in the greater community and hope for our future.

Brother Louis DeThomasis, FSC, Ph.D, is the president of St. Mary's College of Minnesota. The college was founded in 1912. The renowned Christian Brothers teaching order directs the academic life of the nearly 1,200 undergraduate and 700 graduate students. The college offers over 50 undergraduate academic programs, majors, and career preparations and 12 master degree programs, and is accredited by the North Central Association of Colleges and Schools.

TRIBUTE TO FRANCISCO (CHICO) MENDES

HON. GUS YATRON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to honor internationally known ecologist, Francisco (Chico) Mendes, who was brutally assassinated last month. I am deeply saddened by this appalling and shocking tragedy.

Mr. Mendes was a man of great courage, fortitude, and determination. He was a leader in the effort to preserve Brazil's tropical rain forests, which are increasingly being destroyed for unwise economic activities. Mr. Mendes was also an important force in human rights, as he actively worked to protect indigenous peoples and landless tappers from ruthless exploitation and callous disregard of their basic human rights. The plight of indigenous peoples is indeed most serious. Many times their homes are destroyed, lifestyles totally disrupted, and they are threatened with physical abuse and even death if they offer any resistance to those seeking to pursue forest destruction activities. Mr. Mendes was honored by the U.N. for his activities.

Tropical rain forests are extremely valuable to mankind as a source of critical medicines, food, and industrial products. They contain over two-thirds of the world's life forms, and play a vital role in offsetting the greenhouse effect. Tropical forests also help preserve the soil and water resources, and mitigate deforestation.

Mr. Mendes stood up to some very powerful forces in Brazil and he paid the ultimate price. He must be remembered for his tremendous contributions to the preservation of nature, and human life. I am confident that the authorities in Brazil will bring to justice the individual or individuals responsible for this hideous deed.

PUBLIC HEALTH AND THE NEW NATIONAL EFFORT

HON. LOUIS STOKES

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 19, 1989

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I was present at the 1988 American Public Health Association [APHA] annual meeting when their outgoing president, Dr. Bailus Walker, gave a brilliant presidential address on "Public Health and the New National Effort." In this speech, he spelled out some long-term solutions to national health problems that continue to plague our society.

Dr. Walker's insightful comments have great significance for the public health of America. Indeed, as we debate the many pressing health issues before us, his remarks give us much food for thought.

Mr. Speaker, I want to share this address with you and my colleagues, and hope that you give consideration to Dr. Walker's remarks:

THE AMERICAN PUBLIC HEALTH ASSOCIATION: PUBLIC HEALTH AND THE NEW NATIONAL EFFORT

(By Bailus Walker, Jr.)

Since the mid-nineteenth century—a period in American public health most notable for the extraordinary Report of the Sanitary Commission of Massachusetts—public health activities have progressed through a variety of experiences being pushed and pulled by new technologies, changes in patterns of disease and dysfunction and in demographics and new directions in economic and political developments.

Indeed the 1980s for all of us were trying and tumultuous as it became clear that infectious disease was still a threat in the developed world. A viral disease, AIDS, tested our ability to manage the biomedical dimensions of a disease and, at the same time, to cope with a maelstrom of social, economic and political challenges that accompanied this epidemic.

But we proceeded apace on several other fronts. In molecular biology, in neuroscience, in toxicology, in the broad dimensions of clinical epidemiology, in agricultural science and in population science, to name only six, the advances over the last years have been remarkable. Through these fields, we are reaching toward a clearer understanding of the environmental and behavioral determinants of physical and mental disorders and of ways in which scientific advances and technological innovations can help bring about necessary reforms in personal health care and the broader systems of health services. As we move in this direction, we approach a threshold where our technical knowledge of such developments outpaces our social, philosophical and ethical readiness to deal with them. We also intensify the debate over the full social and economic cost of new developments in science and technology, including concerns of equity of access to resources. This latter issue evokes the classic debate of universal access to health care. I call it a classic debate because it has been endemic to the health profession for many decades. And today there seems to be no workable solution for filling the gaps for 37 million Americans either without or with limited health insurance short of a restructuring of the health care system, an unlikely approach in the near term.

During the 1980s, environmental health issues regained enough momentum and had broad enough impact to find its way into the issue papers of the Presidential campaign.

Stunned by evidence of improper waste management, ecological damage and environmental deterioration, America called for a renewed war on air and water pollution. So serious are some of the environmental quality issues that many analysts have called for a "third wave" of attack on environmental problems. The first wave came at the turn of the century and the second arrived in 1962 with the publication of Silent Spring by Rachel Carson.

And now as we near the end of this decade, a new President is taking office determined to move on several fronts of primary concern to the public health community and all of its allies.

As this era begins, it is fitting for the public health community—a field for the efforts of many groups and specialties—to consider what role it should play in assuring a continuing effort to meet the health, social and economic needs of the American people.

Indeed, because we represent a major source of talented people with unique skills in formulating policy, in planning and in the implementation of programs and services, we have a duty to use our resources to devise new and fresh approaches to familiar problems.

Over the past several months, we have seen clear documentation of the need to work on problems selected because of their significance to the well-being of mankind, not only at home but throughout the world; to do so by seeking to understand the root causes of these problems rather than treatment of their symptoms and be willing to persist in such efforts until the job is done.

There is no more appropriate example than the infant mortality rate—a problem so serious that not one but two highly respected commissions earlier this year called to our attention the need to do more to prevent the 40,000 infant deaths that now occur each year.

This problem is distressingly bound up with an ever increase in certain familiar pathologies of disenfranchisement—teenage pregnancy, substance abuse, social and economic disintegration. To be sure, the face of poverty in America has changed over the past two decades. significant social and economic developments have made it possible for many working-class and middle-class families to move away from the urban centers.

The decline in jobs for unskilled workers, deterioration of family stability and changes in the mix of people and services in urban centers have caused the emergence of an underclass. This group is small compared with how many poor there are in the United States but it has grown rapidly. From 1975 to 1985, the underclass grew from 750,000 to 2.5 million. This group is characterized by a growing separation from the rest of society, its norms and especially its resources.

Certainly it is easy to dismiss this problem on the assumption that the price for positive health and well-being for most of us is that government ignores the rest of us. Or we can claim that the state or federal deficit and other priorities prevent us from investing more of our resources in programs to reduce the risk of these human tragedies. Still further we can say that we have put into place legal and other mechanisms, and that we have already stretched our mind and our will as far as we can and there is simply no solution to this problem of tractable poverty, family disintegration and widespread illiteracy.

We have another choice.

We can in the months and years ahead join forces with soon-to-be former Senator Lawton Chiles of Florida, Chairman of the National Commission on Infant Mortality, as he continues his outstanding work in this area. And with Congressman Louis Stokes of Ohio as he pursues new policies and resources to address the fundamental flaws in our prenatal care systems. We can also join forces with the numerous major projects supported by several philanthropic groups to upgrade the chances of both parents and children trapped in poverty.

All of these groups and thousands of other individuals have recognized that removing some social and economic barriers has led to advances for some groups; for an alarmingly large group, the situation has not changed or has changed for the worse.

Perhaps this is the result of our short attention span for national problems. Indeed, it may be getting shorter and shorter. We debate issues, ensure they are publicized, pass new laws or amend existing laws, invest a few dollars, get bored and move on to other issues. All too often, we pursue short-term solutions to problems that require long-term sustained commitments. We are cheating the entire nation if we attempt to dispose of the infant death problem with short-term solutions.

It will not be enough to conduct more research on the determinants of infant mortality or to hold more conferences or symposia because the nation is not interested in further identification or documentation of the problem or in the oratorical excesses which often cloud the real solution to infant deaths. It is concerned about moving forward with progressive and aggressive interventions by the public and private sectors. In this regard, a particular problem for organized public health is the lack of broad supportive relationships with the medical care profession. There are numerous examples of practicing physicians being supportive of comprehensive maternal and child health services but confrontation too often characterizes the relationship from both sides.

The National Academy of Science's Commission to Study the Future of Public Health in the U.S. in its survey found medical care leaders who were simply unaware of the scope of infant health services provided by state and local health agencies. Yet, those same leaders are crucial to the achievement of broad community support for maternal and child health services and numerous related public health activities for which the cooperation of the private medical community is highly desirable.

It is here that the public health community as a whole must exercise more effective and sustained leadership in improving these relationships, in the development of even broader coalitions to coordinate, monitor, urge and advocate long-term actions for a reduction in the U.S. infant mortality rate, presently the worst record among 20 industrialized nations. Our efforts must reach beyond the traditional boundaries of prenatal services to help provide future parents with the social skills and confidence necessary to take advantage of educational opportunities. Not all potential parents come from mainstream backgrounds and enter the health service system prepared to accept counseling and guidance on healthful practices and behavior. The failure of health service providers to recognize this and to understand the sociocultural misalignment between the health service environment and home/community settings account in part for continuing problems of infant mortality.

Many kinds of development, in social, psychological, emotional, moral, linguistic and cognitive areas are critical to the survival of mother and child. The attitudes, values and behavior of the parents and their social network strongly affect the health and welfare of infants. Thus all the money and effort expended on prenatal health services will have only limited benefits as long as the underlying developmental, social and economic issues remain unaddressed. Yet most public health service providers today are not trained to organize and manage the health systems in ways that support the overall social and economic development of parents. Nor does their training enable them to analyze, much less solve, the social misalignment problems of mothers and fathers from outside the mainstream.

In this new era, we must reassess current approaches to maternal and child health services, learn how to implement approaches that work and allocate resources more effectively. Such a reassessment should be guided by knowledge of public health, human ecology, history, parental and child development—and by common sense. Moreover, the service system must be freed from the pressures of political expediency and the interest of researchers must be balanced against those of direct service providers.

As a community, we have an obligation to the people we serve to assure the continuation of functions that are truly important to the health of this nation, especially when these functions cannot be carried out satisfactorily by private means alone. But, even before the National Academy of Sciences' (NAS) report on the future of public health, it was evident that there were significant deficiencies in the system for the delivery of public and personal health services measured in terms of their ability to meet the broad spectrum of needs of the nation.

Addressing essentially the same point, David Rogers observes: "In the last decade, we have seen the progressive weakening of local, county and state public health agencies and public health clinics. We have watched the dissolution of the once proud and distinguished public health service medical officers corps. Public health services hospitals are apparently to vanish from the scene and shifting national priorities are now leading to the cruelest blow of all—sharply declining federal support of schools of public health."

Efforts to correct these perceivable deficiencies tend to reflect the past, not the opportunities for the future—a future in which demographic changes and disease patterns will pose critical questions for the public health professions. These trends have been widely discussed but have not been readily factored into the equation for future health services—preventive, curative and rehabilitative.

How can we hope to provide equitable health opportunity as a human right to all our people as long as there are major deficiencies in the system including fragmentation, ineffective leadership, staff shortage and a poor public image. Effective state and local health agencies are essential to our social and economic progress. Because after all the Federal policies have been developed, dollars appropriated, and technical assistance offered, it is the state and local health departments that reduce those resources to their lowest common denominator—direct services to people.

There is no "conspiracy of silence" concerning deficiencies in this system but there is less than adequate action from within the public health community (and all health is public health) on the appropriate corrective strategy.

But damage due to inattention or lack of organized concern is not irreversible. It can indeed be repaired by active intervention in the stewardship of change. It will require not only an unrelenting commitment to the system of endeavors which comprise the public health services but also the ability to lead the system into the future.

Thus, the NAS Future of Public Health Report deserves respectful discussion—a continuing and open dialogue among policymakers, academicians, public health providers, and community leaders on ways to enhance the present-day and continuing future importance of public health service to the social, economic and political life in the United States.

In this process, we must address a basic problem which should be posed with some sense of urgency: How can one institutionalize the thoughtful consideration of the interrelated areas of endeavor—health sciences research, education of health practitioners, and the delivery of health services—with a view toward effective constructs for action?

In this area, the public health community has special and unique responsibilities to bring about support in the social and political arena for major reforms in the way public health priorities are set, resources allocated, and organizational changes implemented. This is particularly important since these matters are as much economic and social as medical or health sciences.

Legislative and executive branch programs of recent years to deal with the public health service system have had too little thoughtful and constructive consideration of a meaningful nature from within the framework of public health. This is said without rancor for the situation is understandable. The problems are complex, their solution requires the collection and analysis of large bodies of information. Not only is the information costly to gather and process, but also different types of information may imply contradictory policy decisions. Faced with this issue, legislative and executive branches often end up making the most politically expedient decisions, not necessarily the most desirable in terms of public health goals and objectives. Our experience with AIDS is replete with examples of this deficiency.

Another theme which should affect our work in this new era is international health.

Computers and rapid telecommunications are making business, politics, social and cultural issues truly global. What once were domestic public health issues now have direct impact on other nations because of the increasingly interactive global environment.

World hunger and malnutrition continue to be major international priorities. World Bank estimates that a billion people worldwide are chronically undernourished. That is roughly a quarter of the world population. Their problem is lingering malnutrition, undernutrition and outright starvation. But their problems are also medical ones that attend hunger: physical and mental underdevelopment, lowered resistance to infections and a broad spectrum of other dysfunctions.

Few health and medical curricula today devote any time at all to sleeping sickness, schistosomiasis, hook worm, river blindness or leprosy. But for large segments of the world's population, these diseases are all too familiar. They are acute and chronic afflictions that affect a country's vitality and undercut economic and social progress. They diminish life expectancy by years and even decades, wasting valuable human resources.

And then there are the deeply troubling health effects of apartheid in southern Africa, a problem so serious that it must be discussed in its own right. One cannot appreciate fully the impact of this policy until he or she has visited the frontline states in southern Africa and observed the disease, dysfunction and premature deaths caused by the government of South Africa's support for the guerrilla movement and for other forces designed to destabilize that entire region.

Last summer, I, along with other health and medical practitioners visited Mozambique as members of the Mozambique Health Assessment Mission sponsored by the Ford Foundation. Our analyses show that South Africa-supported terrorists have destroyed more than 500 health stations depriving some 3 million people of basic health services; forced the closing of 2,600 schools serving 500,000 children; caused the death of 280,000 children between 1980 and 1987; and forced the displacement of more than one-third of the state's population.

Less than 10 percent of the population have access to safe and sanitary water supplies and guerrilla attacks along the main roads have made it almost impossible to transport food and other supplies to approximately 900,000 people in need.

And here we must commend the outstanding work of UNICEF, CARE, WHO and many other nongovernmental organizations for their interventions in that state. Their efforts are beyond reproach and they deserve commendations of the highest order.

We also commend the Reagan Administration for its positive response to the appeal from APHA and others for the United States to pay its delayed contribution to the United Nations (UN). During the last week in October of this year, UN Ambassador Vernon Walters handed over checks totaling $110,000 million to the UN Secretary General for payments toward the amount Congress authorized for the UN in 1987 and 1988 and $60 million in a voluntary contribution to UNICEF and other relief organizations. It is expected that another payment of $28 million will be made within the next 30 days.

We have every right to be proud of these developments. But for southern Africa, we need a long-term solution to the public health problems and economic distress of the region. That solution is an immediate end to the political system of South Africa which stirs violence, destroys schools, homes and health care facilities and oppresses the majority of its people.

As long as apartheid is in power in South Africa, no amount of UN assistance and no effort by UNICEF or WHO can prevent the occurrence or the progression of physical and mental disorders among the children and adults of the region. Tentative truces between South Africa and its black-ruled neighbors are not enough. What is called for is the political and international will to insist on the complete abolition of a system that wounds children and destroys any hope of a future for them.

But one of the hardest adjustments for any entrenched system to make is for the people in power to discard outdated philosophies and political direction and make room for new possibilities. Social, economic and political systems that are flexible, that make productive use of all of its human resources can take better advantage of future scientific and technological development to prevent disease and premature deaths than those that attempt to graft new economic and social development onto rigid obsolete systems.

In the past, most public health specialists have appreciated that political oppression, social and economic deprivation were serious injustices but few have seen it as a threat to the health of every single community—individual and group. The fact is, however, we cannot build a strong world economy whose strength depends on a high level of wellness, on creative and cognitive skills if health promotion and disease prevention activities are reserved for a small select group.

It is not surprising that historians are taking a new look at the human health effects of social and economic systems and of political ideology and discovering interesting complexities and noteworthy origins. We observe this week the 50th Anniversary of Kristallnacht—the Night of Broken Glass—a period in November 1938 when Nazis rampaged against Jewish homes, businesses and places of worship. That tragic event of human resource destruction and everything that followed can be traced to the traditional German weakness of tribal nationalism, social-Darwinistic racism, and knee-jerk authoritarianism reaching far back into the 19th Century—similar in many respects to the development of the apartheid system in South Africa.

But whatever the relationship between Kristallnacht and the Holocaust and their similarities to present tragedies in Mozambique, never again should we allow the "virus of racial hatred" to increase the incidence of disease and disability and otherwise take its toll on world communities. We must be constantly aware that indifference and inertia in preventing racial injustices can be as destructive to our human resources as active bigotry.

Perhaps Secretary of State George Shultz summarized it best in a speech to the National Academy of Sciences last September and I can do no better than to quote him:

"For the United States, the course of our present and future policies is clear: We cannot successfully pursue our national political and security interest without taking global conditions into account."

Against all of the foregoing, what can be said about future practitioners of public health in an era when there will be a constant search for new definitions of the responsibilities of a learned profession in a quest for greater progress and prosperity?

The practitioners of the future will need the capability of dealing with a steadily expanding and increasingly sophisticated science base and effectively marrying it to his/her human support responsibilities.

The cutting edge in the advances of public health is the information derived from molecular genetics, physiology and biotechnology. This fact will be progressively more powerful in determining the insight into primary and secondary determinants of community health profiles.

The public health practitioner in this new era will need a deep appreciation for the continuity of his/her activities with those of the research establishment, and an understanding of the synergistic relationship between investigation and direct public health services.

And as AIDS has so clearly taught us, we must have more than simply a passing interest in the application of social science to public health services and to health policy.

As a group of distinguished social scientists have readily acknowledged, much of social science knowledge is too abstract, too uncertain and too qualified to serve practitioners or policymakers in a way that can be immediately applied. But more often than not, such insights and data inform the practitioner's thinking, their view of the problem and the options they consider.

Particularly for the occupational health specialist, new skills, knowledge and attitudes will be necessary to cope with health problems arising from the starting growth in diversity of the labor force. Of the 25 million people expected to join the labor force in the next dozen years, 85 percent will be women, minorities and immigrants. Occupational disease prevention and control will take place in a context of more dynamic interactions among labor, management and government within the industrial relations system impinged by international market and budgetary forces. The technological settings and the power context in the larger society will be among the epidemiologic considerations for understanding the origin of work-related illness. In a pivotal role, the occupational health specialist will be called on to help employers and employees understand and value differences and minimize stress in a work-setting where the teamwork will be critical to daily productivity. There will also be relevant new centers of concern about health care cost, health services for retirees, family issues such as day care, quality of education, and skill training, particularly in large enterprises requiring substantial out-placement of employees. These issues will be further exacerbated by more decentralized and diffuse U.S. workplaces and periods of bizarre macroeconomics fluctuation.

The curricular derivatives of the views presented here are several. Schools of medicine, of the health sciences, and of public health—if they are not to become extinct—will need more innovative and meaningful interplay with the world of public health practice—the so-called frontline.

This interaction must seek not simply the cultural enrichment of future health practitioners but early and extensive exposure to broad consideration of issues in human welfare—the economic and political aspects.

Techniques for the development and examination of public health policy, communication with the public and interfaces with those in many other fields will suggest themselves.

In the academic settings designed to prepare students for public health practice, all is not bad for scientists concerned with research, the scientist-professional primarily concerned with the provision of service. For continued stress in these areas is a certainty, and stress begets change and to the thoughtful, this provides the opportunity for innovation. But we must guard against the destructive effects of a system where academicians fiercely protect their turf, shrewdly hustle research, distort epidemiologic and biomedical data to enhance their private consulting services. These practices do not serve the larger ends of learning and culture nor do they address in a sincere way society's most pressing health needs.

CONCLUSIONS

The issues I have rehearsed remind us of how important it is to build an effective partnership throughout the public health community, with government, business and industry and with international health, economic and social systems throughout the world.

This coherence of disciplines—the synergism of the sciences, the congruity of responsibilities of health and medical researchers, educators and providers of direct health care—constitutes a tremendous potential to enhance the quality of life of people not only here at home but throughout the world.

We have the talent, the skills and commitment to excellence; if we remain open and engaged there will be reason for optimism and self-congratulations when we meet for the 117th Annual Meeting of this Association.

It has been a privilege to be able to work on parts of that agenda on behalf of APHA and I look forward to doing more in the months ahead.

THE INAUGURAL CEREMONY

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, Mr. Vice President, and my fellow Americans: On behalf of the Joint Congressional Committee on Inaugural Ceremonies, welcome to the Bicentennial Presidential Inauguration. It is now my pleasure to present for the invocation the Reverend Billy Graham.

Will everyone please rise?

INVOCATION

Reverend GRAHAM. Shall we pray?

Our Father and our God, Thou hast said blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord.

We recognize on this historic occasion that we are a nation under God. This faith in God is our foundation and our heritage. Thou hast warned us in the Holy Scriptures if the foundations be destroyed, what can the righteous do?

We confess that we are in danger of destroying some of those foundations for times our faith in Thee has faltered and we have chosen to go our own way than the way that Thou would have us go, both as individuals and as a nation.

Forgive us, we pray, as we turn to Thee in repentance and in faith. Restore us to Thyself and recreate within us a desire to follow Thy will for all our lives.

As George Washington reminded us in his Farewell Address, morality and faith are the pillars of our society. May we never forget that.

The Scriptures also say promotion comes not from the East nor from the West but from Thee.

We acknowledge Thy divine help in the selection of our leadership each 4 years.

We recognize, O Lord, in our sovereignty Thou hast permitted Ronald Reagan to lead us for the past 8 years. We pray that as he and his wife, Nancy, leave the White House and go to the west coast, Thou would give them many more years of health and happiness.

Now we come to a new era in our history. In Thy sovereignty, Thou hast permitted George Bush to lead us at this momentous hour in our history for the next 4 years. As he today places his hand upon the Bible and solemnly swears before Thee to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution, give him the wisdom, integrity, and courage to help this become a nation that is gentle and kind.

Protect him from physical danger; and in the lovely moments of decision, grant him Thy wisdom to know what is morally right, and uncompromising courage to do it. Give him a cool head and a warm heart; give him a compassion for those in physical, moral, and spiritual need.

O God, we consecrate today George Herbert Walker Bush to the Presidency of these United States, with the assurance that from this hour on, as he and his family move into the White House, they will have the presence and the power of the One who said, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." We pray Thou will bless his wife, Barbara, and their children as they stand at his side, and his mother, who is here today. And what we pray for President Bush, we also pray for Vice President JAMES DANFORTH QUAYLE and his wife, Marilyn, and their children. We pray as well for the members of the Cabinet, the Congress, the courts, and all others whom Thou hast entrusted with positions of leadership. We pray that the spiritual tide that many of us have sensed running in this Nation may continue. As we read our newspapers and watch our television screens, it seems that evil is getting worse, but we thank Thee for the millions of people who pray daily and go to church and synagogue on the weekends. We believe that this is the day the Lord has made. Let us rejoice and be glad in it.

All this we pray in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Mr. FORD. It is now my special pleasure to introduce the Harlan Boys' Choir from Harlan, KY, under the direction of Mr. David Davies. They will sing "This Is My Country."

(The Harlan, KY, Boys' Choir sang "This Is My Country.")

[Applause.]

Mr. FORD. It is now my pleasure to present my distinguished colleague, the honorable TED STEVENS, a Senator from Alaska, to introduce the Vice Presidential oath and the Presidential oath.

Senator STEVENS.

Mr. STEVENS. Thank you, Chairman FORD, for your many courtesies.

President and Mrs. Reagan and Vice President and Mrs. Bush, fellow citizens: The Vice President-elect will take his oath of his office as his wife, Marilyn Tucker Quayle, holds the Quayle family Bible. Their children, Tucker, Benjamin, and Corinne, will join them. The Vice President-elect has asked a gracious lady, the first woman to sit on the Highest Court of our land, to administer his oath of office. It is my honor to present now the distinguished Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, the Honorable Sandra Day O'Connor, to administer the oath of office to the Vice President-elect, JAMES DANFORTH QUAYLE.

ADMINISTRATION OF OATH OF OFFICE TO THE VICE PRESIDENT

Associate Justice O'CONNOR. Raise your right hand.

Associate Justice of the United States Sandra Day O'Connor administered to the Vice President-elect the oath of office prescribed by the Constitution, which he repeated, as follows:

I, JAMES DANFORTH QUAYLE, do solemnly swear that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion, and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me God.

Associate Justice O'CONNOR. Congratulations.

[Applause.]

Mr. STEVENS. S. Sgt. Alvy Powell, of the U.S. Army Band, will now sing "God Bless America."

(S. Sgt. Alvy Powell, of the U.S. Army Band, sang "God Bless America.")

[Applause.]

Mr. STEVENS. Thank you, Staff Sergeant Powell.

President Reagan, Vice President and Mrs. Quayle, fellow Americans: The wife of the President-elect, Barbara Bush, will hold the Bible first used at the inauguration of President George Washington, together with the Bush Bible.

With us today is the President-elect's mother, Mrs. Prescott Bush; George, Jr.; Neil; Marvin; and Dorothy, with their families, who join their father and mother on this platform.

It is now my great privilege and high honor to present the Chief Justice of the United States, the Honorable William Hubbs Rehnquist, who will administer the oath of office to the President-elect of the United States, George Herbert Walker Bush.

[Applause.]

ADMINISTRATION OF OATH OF OFFICE TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. Chief Justice REHNQUIST. Please raise your right hand and repeat after me.

The Chief Justice of the United States, William Hubbs Rehnquist, administered to the President-elect the oath of office prescribed by the Constitution, which he repeated, as follows:

I, George Herbert Walker Bush, do solemnly swear that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and will, to the best of my ability, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States. So help me God.

Mr. Chief Justice REHNQUIST. Congratulations.

[Applause.]

(Four ruffles and flourishes, "Hail to the Chief," and 21-gun salute.)

Mr. FORD. Ladies and gentlemen, the President of the United States.

INAUGURAL ADDRESS

President BUSH. Mr. Chief Justice, Mr. President, Vice President QUAYLE, Senator MITCHELL, Speaker WRIGHT, Senator DOLE, Congressman MICHEL, and fellow citizens, neighbors, and friends.

There is a man here who has earned a lasting place in our hearts—and in our history. President Reagan, on behalf of our Nation, I thank you for the wonderful things that you have done for America. [Applause.]

I have just repeated, word for word, the oath taken by George Washington 200 years ago; and the Bible on which I placed my hand is the Bible on which he placed his.

It is right that the memory of Washington be with us today, not only because this is our Bicentennial Inauguration, but because Washington remains the Father of our country. And he would, I think, be gladdened by this day, for today is the concrete expression of a stunning fact: our continuity these 200 years since our Government began.

We meet on democracy's front porch, a good place to talk as neighbors and as friends. For this is a day when our Nation is made whole, when our differences for a moment are suspended.

And my first act as President is a prayer. I ask you to bow your heads:

Heavenly Father, we bow our heads and thank You for Your love. Accept our thanks for the peace that yields this day and the shared faith that makes its continuance likely. Make us strong to do Your work, willing to heed and hear Your will, and write on our hearts these words: "Use power to help people." For we are given power not to advance our own purposes, nor to make a great show in the world, nor a name. There is but one just use of power, and it is to serve people. Help us to remember it, Lord. Amen.

I come before you and assume the Presidency at a moment rich with promise. We live in a peaceful, prosperous time, but we can make it better. For a new breeze is blowing, and a world refreshed by freedom seems reborn; for in man's heart, if not in fact, the day of the dictator is over. [Applause.]

The totalitarian era is passing, its old ideas blown away like leaves from an ancient, lifeless tree.

A new breeze is blowing—and a nation refreshed by freedom stands ready to push on: There is new ground to be broken, and new action to be taken.

There are times when the future seems thick as a fog; you sit and wait, hoping the mists will lift and reveal the right path.

But this is a time when the future seems a door you can walk right through—into a room called tomorrow.

Great nations of the world are moving toward democracy—through the door to freedom.

Men and women of the world move toward free markets—through the door to prosperity.

The people of the world agitate for free expression and free thought—through the door to the moral and intellectual satisfactions that only liberty allows.

We know what works: Freedom works. We know what's right: Freedom is right. We know how to secure a more just and prosperous life for man on Earth: through free markets, free speech, free elections, and the exercise of free will unhampered by the state. [Applause.]

For the first time in this century—for the first time in perhaps all history—man does not have to invent a system by which to live. We don't have to talk late into the night about which form of government is better. We don't have to wrest justice from the kings. We only have to summon it from within ourselves.

We must act on what we know. I take as my guide the hope of a saint: In crucial things, unity; in important things, diversity; in all things, generosity.

America today is a proud, free Nation, decent and civil—a place we cannot help but love. We know in our hearts, not loudly and proudly, but as a simple fact, that this country has meaning beyond what we see, and that our strength is a force for good.

But have we changed as a nation even in our time? Are we enthralled with material things, less appreciative of the nobility of work and sacrifice?

My friends, we are not the sum of our possessions. They are not the measure of our lives. In our hearts we know what matters. We cannot hope only to leave our children a bigger car, a bigger bank account. We must hope to give them a sense of what it means to be a loyal friend, a loving parent, a citizen who leaves his home, his neighborhood and town better than he found it.

What do we want the men and women who work with us to say when we are no longer there? That we were more driven to succeed than anyone around us? Or that we stopped to ask if a sick child had gotten better, and stayed a moment there to trade a word of friendship?

No President, no government, can teach us to remember what is best in what we are. But if the man you have chosen to lead this Government can help make a difference; if he can celebrate the quieter, deeper successes that are made not of gold and silk, but of better hearts and finer souls; if he can do these things, then he must.

America is never wholly herself unless she is engaged in high morale principle. We as a people have such a purpose today. It is to make kinder the face of the Nation and gentler the face of the world.

My friends, we have work to do. [Applause.]

There are the homeless, lost and roaming; there are the children who have nothing, no love, no normalcy; there are those who cannot free themselves of enslavement to whatever addiction—drugs, welfare, the demoralization that rules the slums. There is crime to be conquered, the rough crime of the streets. There are young women to be helped who are about to become mothers of children they can't care for and might not love. They need our care, our guidance, and our education; though we bless them for choosing life.

The old solution, the old way, was to think that public money alone could end these problems. But we have learned that that is not so. And in any case, our funds are low. We have a deficit to bring down. We have more will than wallet; but will is what we need.

We will make the hard choices, looking at what we have, perhaps allocating it differently, making our decisions based on honest need and prudent safety.

And then we will do the wisest thing of all: We will turn to the only resource we have that in times of need always grows: the goodness and the courage of the American people. [Applause.]

I am speaking of a new engagement in the lives of others—a new activism, hands-on and involved, that gets the job done. We must bring in the generations, harnessing the unused talent of the elderly and the unfocused energy of the young. For not only leadership is passed from generation to generation, but so is stewardship. And the generation born after the Second World War has come of age.

I have spoken of a thousand points of light—of all the community organizations that are spread like stars throughout the Nation, doing good.

We will work hand in hand, encouraging, sometimes leading, sometimes being led, rewarding. We will work on this in the White House, in the Cabinet agencies. I will go to the people and the programs that are the brighter points of light, and I will ask every member of my government to become involved.

The old ideas are new again because they are not old; they are timeless: duty, sacrifice, commitment, and a patriotism that finds its expression in taking part and pitching in. [Applause.]

We need a new engagement, too, between the Executive and the Congress.

The challenges before us will be thrashed out with the House and the Senate. We must bring the Federal budget into balance. And we must ensure that America stands before the world united: strong, at peace, and fiscally sound. But, of course, things may be difficult.

We need compromise; we have had dissension. We need harmony; we have had a chorus of discordant voices.

For Congress, too, has changed in our time. There has grown a certain divisiveness. We have seen the hard looks and heard the statements in which not each other's ideas are challenged, but each other's motives. And our great parties have too often been far apart, and untrusting of each other.

It has been this way since Vietnam. That was cleaves us still. But, friends, that war began in earnest a quarter of a century ago; and surely the statute of limitations has been reached. This is a fact: The final lesson of Vietnam is that no great nation can long afford to be sundered by a memory.

A new breeze is blowing—and the old bipartisanship must be made new again. [Applause.]

To my friends—and yes, I do mean friends—in the loyal opposition—and yes, I mean loyal: I put out my hand.

I am putting out my hand to you, Mr. Speaker.

I am putting out my hand to you, Mr. Majority Leader.

For this is the thing: This is the age of the offered hand.

And we can't turn back clocks and I don't want to. But when our fathers were young, Mr. Speaker, our differences ended at the water's edge. And we don't wish to turn back time, but when our mothers were young, Mr. Majority Leader, the Congress and the Executive were capable of working together to produce a budget on which this Nation could live. Let us negotiate soon—and hard. But in the end, let us produce.

The American people await action. They didn't send us here to bicker. They ask us to rise above the merely partisan. [Applause.]

"In crucial things, unity"—and this, my friends, is crucial.

To the world, too, we offer new engagement and a renewed vow: We will stay strong to protect the peace. The "offered hand" is a reluctant fist; but once made, strong, and can be used with great effect.

There are today Americans who are held against their will in foreign lands, and Americans who are unaccounted for. Assistance can be shown here, and will be long remembered. Good will begets good will. Good faith can be a spiral that endlessly moves on.

"Great nations like great men must keep their word." When America says something, America means it, whether a treaty or an agreement or a vow made on marble steps. [Applause.]

We will always try to speak clearly, for candor is a compliment. But subtlety, too, is good and has its place.

While keeping our alliances and friendships around the world strong, ever strong, we will continue the new closeness with the Soviet Union, consistent both with our security and with progress. One might say that our new relationships in part reflects the triumph of hope and strength over experience. But hope is good. And so is strength. And vigilance.

Here today are tens of thousands of our citizens who feel the understandable satisfaction of those who have taken part in democracy and seen their hopes fulfilled.

But my thoughts have been turning the past few days to those who would be watching at home—

To an older fellow who will throw a salute by himself when the flag goes by, and the women who will tell her sons the words of the battle hymns. I don't mean this to be sentimental. I mean that on days like this, we remember that we are all part of a continuum, inescapably connected by the ties that bind.

Our children are watching in schools throughout our great land. And to them I say, thank you for watching democracy's big day. For democracy belongs to us all, and freedom is like a beautiful kite that can go higher and higher with the breeze.

And to all I say: No matter what your circumstances or where you are, you are part of this day, you are part of the life of our great Nation. [Applause.]

A President is neither prince nor pope, and I don't seek "a window on men's souls." In fact, I yearn for a greater tolerance, an easy-goingness about each other's attitudes and way of life.

There are few clear areas in which we as a society must rise up united and express our intolerance. The most obvious now is drugs. And when that first cocaine was smuggled in on a ship, it may as well have been a deadly bacteria, so much has it hurt the body, the soul of our country. And there is much to be done and to be said. But take my word for it: This scourge will stop. [Applause.]

And so, there is much to do; and tomorrow the work begins.

I do not mistrust the future; I do not fear what is ahead. For our problems are large, but our heart is larger. Our challenges are great, but our will is greater. And if our flaws are endless, God's love is truly boundless.

Some see leadership as high drama, and the sound of trumpets calling. And sometimes it is that. But I see history as a book with many pages—and each day we fill a page with acts of hopefulness and meaning.

The new breeze blows, a page turns, the story unfolds—and so today a chapter begins: a small and stately story of unity, diversity, and generosity—shared, and written, together.

Thank you.

God bless you and God bless the United States of America. [Applause.]

Mr. FORD. Please remain standing for the benediction by Rev. Billy Graham, and remain standing for the singing of our national anthem by S. Sgt. Alvy Powell.

Reverend GRAHAM. Shall we pray?

Our Father, we thank Thee for this great day in the history of democracy. May it touch the whole world. And now:

May the Lord bless thee and keep thee; the Lord make His face to shine upon thee and be gracious unto thee; the Lord lift up His countenance upon thee and give thee peace.

Amen.

The national anthem was sung by S. Sgt. Alvy Powell, audience standing. [Applause.]

The inaugural ceremonies were concluded at 12:28 p.m.

The Senate met at 3:02 p.m., and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. BYRD].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Trust in the Lord with all thine heart; and lean not unto thine own understanding. In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall direct thy path.—Proverbs 3:5-6.

Eternal God, all wise, all powerful and infinitely patient, thank Thee for this gracious guarantee of Godly direction in our lives when we meet the simple conditions laid down.

As the Senate enters its third century at a time of cosmic, domestic, and world need, give the Senators and all leadership the wisdom of Your Word and the will to obey, to the glory of God and benefit of the people.

In His name who is truth. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the order, the majority leader is recognized.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings be approved to date.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, the Senate is in session today for the sole purpose of receiving any executive nominations that President Bush may choose to submit to the Senate for its advice and consent. At the request of President Bush, several committees have already held hearings on some of the President's nominees that will head the Cabinet-level departments, and other committee hearings are scheduled before the Senate reconvenes on next Wednesday.

For the information of my colleagues, I want to outline the Senate's schedule as I now see it for today and next week.

Following this brief statement I will yield to the Republican leader, Senator DOLE. After any remarks he may wish to make and his yielding the floor, we will admit the President's messenger and receive his nominations. The Senate will then, after brief remarks by myself, recess until 12 noon on Wednesday, January 25, according to the provisions of Senate Concurrent Resolution 3.

There will not be any morning business today and under the order previously entered no bills or resolutions may be introduced.

After the Senate reconvenes on Wednesday at 12 noon, I will make a statement setting forth some of our objectives for this Congress. I anticipate that Senator DOLE will make a similar statement on behalf of the Republicans. There will then be a period of time for the transaction of routine morning business which will enable Senators to make speeches and introduce bills and resolutions.

I am planning to have rollcall votes on any of the President's nominations that have then been reported by committees and are ready for floor consideration. I expect that floor consideration on these nominations will begin in midafternoon on Wednesday.

When the Senate completes its business on Wednesday, I expect to recess or adjourn over until 2 p.m. on the following day, Thursday. Although Thursday is the day on which I earlier indicated that the Senate will stay later into the evening, in these first few months I do not anticipate that we should need to stay late next Thursday.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the order, the Republican leader is recognized.

DEATH OF FORMER SENATOR GORDON ALLOTT

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, it is with great sorrow that I announce to the Senate the passing of a former colleague, Senator Gordon Allott, of Colorado, who passed away Tuesday of this week. Our distinguished colleague, Senator BILL ARMSTRONG, is absent today attending the funeral.

(By request of Mr. DOLE, the following statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD.)

A SENATOR'S SENATOR

● Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, this Tuesday Colorado and the Nation lost a man who was for me both a personal friend and a mentor. He was truly a Senator's Senator. Gordon Allott passed away this Tuesday and he will be greatly missed.

Funeral services are being held this Friday in Colorado. I will be there and of course will be expressing sympathy from all of us to Gordon's wife, Welda; his two sons Roger and Gordon, and the rest of the Allott family. But I know the Senate will also wish to take note of his passing and have asked that these remarks be placed in the RECORD.

We often hear the words "public servant," but I am not sure we always know what that means. For a fitting example, look no further than the life of Gordon Allott. County and city attorney; Army Air Force officer in World War II; district attorney; Colorado Lieutenant Governor; and three-term Member of the U.S. Senate. In the Senate Allott served on the Appropriations and Interior Committees. He was also chairman of the Senate Republican Policy Committee, the post I now hold. He promoted the interests of our State and of the country in a quiet, firm way. We admired his skill as a legislator, his foresight in planning for Colorado's future needs, his personal and public integrity.

Those qualities gave a generation of young men and women in Colorado an example to follow. And that, I think, is Gordon Allott's real legacy. He recruited talented young people; gave many their first start in politics and government; inspired others to become active in their own community. There are many graduates from the Gordon Allott school of public service—some with names of national prominence; others not as well known, but serving with the same dignity and conviction so characteristic of Senator Gordon Allott.

Colorado is truly a wonderful State. For those of us who live there and others who visit, it is so easy to see how our State inspired the words for the song "America the Beautiful." But, as Teddy Roosevelt once observed, Colorado's true wealth is not in our natural resources, not in our mountains, but in our people. Allott was still a young child when Roosevelt said that in a speech in Pueblo, CO; but, he must have had citizens like Gordon Allott in mind. I know I do.●

EXTENDING MY THANKS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I would just take 1 second to thank the distinguished majority leader for outlining the program and to indicate and to extend my heartiest congratulations to President Bush, Vice President QUAYLE. In my view, we had an excellent ceremony. I also want to extend my thanks to the members of the Rules Committee, particularly the chairman, Senator FORD, and the ranking Republican, Senator STEVENS.

Now the hard part comes: Doing all these things that I think the President wants to do.

I was pleased this morning when the President directly suggested to the majority leader and the Speaker that he will be working with the Congress. He has assured me of that a number of times. So I would just say for the record that we wish the President the best of luck. He has our best wishes. He is off to a good start. We look forward to working with him and his administration.

I yield the floor.

ORDER TO PLACE CERTAIN NOMINATIONS ON THE EXECUTIVE CALENDAR

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, as if in executive session, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate receives the nominations of James A. Baker III to be Secretary of State, and Elizabeth Hanford Dole to be Secretary of Labor, they be placed directly on the Executive Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senate will receive a message from the President of the United States.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Geisler, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session the Presiding Officer laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations which were referred to the appropriate committees.

BUDGET OF THE UNITED STATES—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 12

Under the authority of the order of the Senate of January 3, 1989, the Secretary of the Senate, on January 9, 1989, during the recess of the Senate, received the following message from the President of the United States, together with accompanying papers; which, pursuant to the order of January 30, 1975, as amended by the order of April 11, 1986, was referred jointly to the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on the Budget:

THE BUDGET MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate:

Eight years ago many in this country were concerned about the future of our economy, our government and, indeed, the Nation itself. Unemployment was high and rising. Inflation and interest rates were reaching record levels. Our Nation's defense capabilities had been weakened by neglect. The international prestige of the U.S. was at low ebb.

To resolve the economic problems then facing us, our administration proposed a recovery program centering on four fundamental principles:

—Reduce personal and business tax rates.

—Reduce the rate of growth of Federal spending.

—Reduce the Federal regulatory burden by eliminating unnecessary restrictions while protecting the public's interest and safety.

—Support a moderate and steady monetary policy to bring inflation under control.

To rebuild our defense capabilities and restore America's standing in the world we proposed expanded national security and international programs.

We also initiated the largest management improvement program ever attempted in order to restore the proper relationships among the Federal, State and local governments, and the private sector; to eliminate waste in Federal programs; and to introduce management controls and efficiencies, while improving services.

Today, the American people can be proud of the progress that has been made on each of these fronts. As a result of this progress, America is internally stronger, internationally more secure, and stands taller in the eyes of the world than it did 8 years ago.

EIGHT YEARS OF ACCOMPLISHMENT

Working together, we have accomplished much over the last eight years.

THE ECONOMY

—The current economic expansion, now in its seventy-fourth month, has outlasted all previous peacetime expansions in U.S. history. Business investment and exports are rising, and economic growth is expected to continue into the 1990's.

—Since this expansion began, 19 million new jobs have been created, while the unemployment rate has fallen by more than 5 percentage points—to 5.4 percent, the lowest level in 14 years.

—Inflation, which averaged 10.4 percent annually during the four years before our administration began, has averaged less than a third of that during the past six years.

—Real after-tax personal income has risen 24 percent since 1982, increasing our overall standard of living.

TAXES AND REGULATIONS

—Between 1981 and 1987, changes in the Federal tax code have made the tax laws more equitable, cut income tax rates, and eliminated Federal income taxes for 4.3 million low-income individuals and families.

—Since 1981, the time spent by the public filling out forms required by the Federal Government has been cut by 600 million hours annually, and the number of pages of regulations published annually in the Federal Register has been reduced by over 45 percent.

BUDGET

—The growth in domestic spending has been slowed, and the budget priorities have been shifted to those functions the Federal Government should provide, such as national defense, basic scientific research, and protecting the rights of all citizens.

—The social security system has been rescued from the brink of insolvency and made sound into the next century.

—The runaway growth of spending for means-tested entitlement programs that occurred in the 1970's has been curbed. Eligibility rules have been tightened to retarget benefits to the needy. Basic benefits for the poor, the elderly, and others in need of Federal assistance have been maintained.

—We have begun the process of putting other entitlement programs on a more rational basis, including Medicare hospital insurance, which was converted to a system that encourages efficiency and lower costs.

DEFENSE AND INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

—Our defenses have been strengthened. Weapons systems have been modernized and upgraded. We are recruiting and retaining higher caliber military personnel. The readiness, training, and morale of our troops have been improved significantly.

—As a result of our greater strength, we were able to negotiate with the Soviet Union a verifiable treaty that completely eliminates an entire class of nuclear missiles.

—We began the Strategic Defense Initiative research and technology program that offers our best hope of a safer world in which our security, and that of our allies, no longer rests on deterrence through the threat of nuclear retaliation, but on defenses that threaten no one.

—Our willingness to defend freedom throughout the world has met with success in the spread of democracy and in turning back the tide of Communist expansion.

MANAGEMENT OF THE GOVERNMENT

—Federal agencies undertook a major management improvement program, "Reform '88," to carry out the cash, credit, and financial operations of the Federal Government in a more business-like manner, and to reduce waste, fraud, and abuse.

—Functions that were pre-empted by the Federal Government are being transferred back to the private sector or to State and local governments.

—Greater use is being made of cost sharing and user fees, shifting the cost of projects and programs where appropriate to those who benefit from them.

THE FEDERAL DEFICIT

The one area in which I have been persistently disappointed throughout my term of office has been in the efforts to bring the budget under control. Time and again I have proposed measures to help curb Federal domestic program spending. Time and again these proposals have been rejected by Congress.

The reasons for the rise in the Federal deficit in the early 1980's are simple. First, we experienced one of the most severe recessions of the postwar period. It has been estimated that 81 percent—over $640 billion—of the growth of the deficit over the 1981-1986 levels originally projected in my March 1981 budget was attributable to that recession. The second reason is that, even after including necessary increases for defense, my March 1981 budget called for net spending reductions totaling $331 billion over 5 years; but Congress approved less than 40 percent of those reductions. Wasteful programs continued to be funded. The necessary reductions have still not been made.

If the deficit is not curbed by continuing to limit the appetite of government, we put in jeopardy all that we worked so hard over the years to achieve. Large deficits brought on by excessive domestic spending undercut the incentives to work and save by absorbing the savings that would otherwise lead to productive investment. We cannot allow this to happen.

I am proud of America's accomplishments. Our economy is booming, our defenses are stronger, and our standing in the world is again second to none.

THIS BUDGET REDUCES THE 1990 DEFICIT BELOW THE G-R-H TARGET AND ACHIEVES BALANCE IN 1993

The fiscal year 1990 budget, my last, represents a continuation of my efforts to reduce the Federal budget deficit through restraint in domestic spending.

The budget I am submitting today complies with the deficit targets set in the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings (G-R-H) Act, by proposing measures that meet the 1990 deficit target of $100 billion and assure a steady reduction in the deficit leading to a balanced budget in 1993.

Under my proposals, the deficit would decline to less than 2 percent of GNP in 1990, and the Federal debt held by the public would also decline as a proportion of GNP.

This budget shows that a gradual elimination of the deficit is possible without raising taxes, without cutting into essential social programs, without devastating defense, and without neglecting other national priorities. It can be done in a reasonable, responsible way—with discipline and fairness. New taxes are not required. Receipts will grow dramatically between 1989 and 1990 because our economy is growing. This budget simply proposes to increase spending by less than the increase in revenues, and therefore, reduce the deficit. The proposed reforms will yield additional deficit reductions in future years. We have an opportunity this year to put the worst of the deficit problem behind us and enable the next Administration to begin its term of office with a clean slate and with the promise of continuing prosperity.

FUNDING NATIONAL PRIORITIES

To address urgent national priorities within the deficit limit set by the G-R-H Act, my budget proposes that some programs—such as those for AIDS research and prevention, drug enforcement, and technology development—receive significant funding increases, while others are reduced, reformed, or, in some cases, terminated.

DEFENSE

Maintaining peace and protecting our country are the foremost responsibilities of the Federal government. Defense budget authority declined in real (inflation-adjusted) terms for the fourth straight year with funding of $299 billion for 1989. This trend cannot continue without severe impact on combat readiness. Therefore, my budget requests defense funding of $315 billion in budget authority and $303 billion in outlays for 1990, and $331 billion in budget authority and $314 billion in outlays in 1991. These amounts provide 2 percent annual real growth in budget authority over the 1989 level, bringing it back up to the 1984 level in inflation-adjusted terms by 1991. The budget also projects 2 percent real growth in these programs in future years.

We must continue to maintain our nuclear deterrent. For 1990, the budget proposes $9.0 billion for atomic energy defense programs, a $0.9 billion increase over 1989. A total of $2.8 billion is dedicated to the modernization of the nuclear materials production complex and to increase environmental clean-up and waste management efforts.

INTERNATIONAL

To consolidate and build on the foreign policy gains of the past eight years, additional funds are needed for international affairs that would promote our foreign policy and national security interests in the Middle East, Central America, and elsewhere. A special program is proposed to foster strong economic growth in the Philippines to support that country's return to democracy. Other increases in foreign aid would pay arrearages on contributions to multilateral lending institutions and make payments to the United Nations and related agencies.

DRUG ABUSE AND LAW ENFORCEMENT

Our fight against drug abuse must continue, as well as our efforts to protect the individual against crime:

—For drug law enforcement, prevention, and treatment programs, I propose $5.7 billion in 1990, an increase of $164 million over 1989. This funding, together with the new authorities and sanctions contained in the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988, will enable us to move toward our goal of a drug-free America.

—To relieve prison overcrowding and adequately house a growing inmate population, I would provide $1.6 billion for prison construction and operation, $193 million more than was devoted to this purpose in 1989.

AIDS RESEARCH AND EDUCATION

This budget reflects my belief that addressing the problem of AIDS must remain a top priority:

—Preventing and alleviating suffering from the Human Immunodeficiency Virus (HIV), which causes AIDS, is our highest public health priority. Federal support for research, prevention, and treatment exceeds $2.1 billion in 1989, and will approach $2.8 billion in 1990. This budget asks for $1.6 billion, or 24 percent over 1989, for Public Health Service HIV funding.

RESEARCH

One of our highest priorities is to strengthen U.S. technology and make America more competitive. For example:

—I propose a continued increase in federally supported basic research aimed at longer-term improvements in the Nation's productivity and global competitiveness. This budget continues the commitment to double National Science Foundation support for academic basic research by 1993, increases support for training future scientists and engineers, and expedites transfer of the results of Government-funded basic research to industry.

—Our space program will provide $13.1 billion for continued development of America's first permanently manned space station; for increased support for improving the performance and reliability of the space shuttle; for initiation of two major new international planetary space science missions; and for support to encourage the commercial development of space.

—Also included in the budget is $250 million in 1990 as the Federal share of support for initiating construction of the Superconducting Super Collider (SSC). Non-Federal cost sharing arrangements will be required to support one-third of the project's costs. The SSC as currently envisaged will be the largest pure science project ever undertaken. It will help keep this country on the cutting edge of high energy physics research well into the next century.

Other areas of Federal responsibility receive priority funding in this budget:

—To continue the Federal Aviation Administration's multi-year program to increase its controller and inspector workforces and to modernize the Nation's air traffic control systems, the budget provides $7.7 billion—a 17 percent increase over the 1989 level.

—To alleviate the problems facing our savings institutions, I propose that the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation (FSLIC) spend $16 billion in 1989 and $9 billion in 1990 to address the most serious thrift institution problems. The Secretary of the Treasury is developing a comprehensive plan to resolve the savings industry's problems, and reform the financial institution regulatory structure and deposit insurance system to prevent a reoccurrence of these problems. I expect the Secretary to submit his proposals to the new President shortly.

—To improve coordination of Federal rural development programs and to redirect funding toward needy rural areas and program recipients, I am continuing support of the rural development initiative coordinated by the Secretary of Agriculture.

—By emphasizing housing vouchers, I would provide housing assistance to 132,000 additional low-income households in 1990, 5 percent more than the 126,124 additional households receiving housing subsidies in 1989. Housing vouchers can serve more low-income households at a lower Federal cost and provide greater opportunity for these families to rent housing of their own choosing.

—To maintain the progress we have been making in fostering State and local education reform, I would sustain the present level of spending on discretionary education programs at $18.5 billion, but refocus those funds to put more money where the needs of the disadvantaged and students with handicaps are greatest.

—To continue the significant progress we have made in cleaning up the environment, I recommend a $105 million increase for the Environmental Protection Agency's regulatory, research and enforcement programs. I also recommend an increase of $315 million for the Superfund hazardous waste cleanup program in order to maintain the program's momentum and support a stronger enforcement role.

—Because changes in the earth's natural systems can have tremendous economic and social effects, global climate change is becoming a critical concern. Our ability to understand and predict these changes is currently limited, and a better understanding is essential for developing policies. The budget proposes a coordinated and effective Federal research program on global change. This budget is accompanied by a report by the Committee on Earth Sciences that describes this program and its strategy.

—Last year's fires on Federal forestlands indicated the need for more timely funding for annual firefighting costs. I therefore propose that two new Federal wild land firefighting accounts be established in the Departments of Agriculture and Interior.

—To further strengthen our energy security, I propose legislation authorizing the sale of the naval petroleum reserves to the private sector in exchange for cash and oil to be added to the strategic petroleum reserve. I also propose the establishment of a separate 10 million barrel defense petroleum inventory.

—To provide for the timely completion of my Reform '88 management improvement program I propose an additional $103 million for 1990, to further improve our management and credit systems.

MAJOR PROGRAMS ARE REFORMED TO ACHIEVE DEFICIT REDUCTION

The program structure and incentives underlying many domestic Federal programs need to be altered to promote greater efficiency and cost-effectiveness.

—Current farm price support programs are far too costly. For the period 1986-89 an estimated $130 billion in Federal spending for farm-related assistance programs provided an average of nearly $600,000 per farmer. Much of this assistance goes to farmers with high incomes—more than twice the U.S. family average. I therefore propose outlay reductions for the price and income support programs of $2 billion in 1990 and additional annual reductions of between $2 and $2.5 billion in each year from 1991 through 1994. In addition, I urge reform of the counterproductive sugar price support program.

—The rapidly rising costs of the medicare program need to be moderated. I propose a reasonable increase in the medicare prospective payment system rate and reductions in hospital capital payments and special graduate medical education payments. Also, in an effort to restrain excessive growth in supplementary medical insurance (SMI) costs, I propose extension of the current law SMI premiums, limitations on physician payments, reductions in payments for certain overpriced procedures, and reforms in the durable medical equipment payment system. Medicare spending would still grow by 9 percent between 1989 and 1990 under these proposals—but not by the 13 percent that would occur under current law.

—I also propose reforms in the medicaid program to reduce spending growth between 1989 and 1990 to $1.7 billion, or 5 percent, rather than the $3.3 billion, or 9 percent, that would occur under current law. These reforms reinstate successful incentives employed in the early 1980's. My budget also proposes restructuring Federal financing of administrative expenses to give States greater incentives to operate their administrative systems as efficiently as possible.

—The Government often continues programs at the Federal level that are either duplicative or are no longer needed, or more appropriately undertaken by other levels of government or the private sector. This is the case with the Economic Development Administration, Amtrak, urban mass transit discretionary grants, and most operating subsidies for the Postal Service. Efforts to reverse this situation have been undertaken by prior administrations as well as my own. These programs should be eliminated. The budget proposes termination of 82 programs that are not needed to satisfy national priorities.

—Under current law, outlays for Federal employee retirement and health benefits are estimated to grow from $51.3 billion in 1989 to $55.9 billion in 1990. I propose freezing retirement cost-of-living allowances (COLAs) and other reforms to hold the 1990 level to slightly above that for 1989, reducing the growth that would otherwise occur by $4.4 billion.

ACHIEVING A PROPER FEDERAL ROLE AND IMPROVING MANAGEMENT

As the Federal Government grew, it took on improper responsibilities, and managed its programs inefficiently. We undertook to return the Federal Government to its proper role. We also initiated a major program to improve the management of the remaining programs. These priorities are continued and expanded in this budget.

PRIVATIZATION

The Government and the private sector should each do what it does best. The Federal Government should not be involved in providing goods and services where private enterprise can do the job cheaper and better.

Accordingly, my budget proposes that a number of Federal enterprises be opened to the private sector, through public offerings or outright sales. Following our success in the sale of Conrail and the sale of $21 billion in selected loan portfolios, I am proposing sale of the naval petroleum reserves, the Alaska Power Administration, and the Southeastern Power Administration. I also propose sale of the Federal Government's helium-processing assets, excess real property, and a further $4.3 billion in loan portfolios. In addition, my budget proposes legislation to establish a government corporation for the uranium enrichment enterprise, as the first step towards eventual privatization.

The Federal Government should also depend more on the private sector to provide ancillary and support services for activities that remain in Federal hands. Therefore, I propose a number of pilot projects and studies in areas such as the private delivery of advertising materials and urgent mail, and the Department of Justice's prison hospitals.

IMPROVED MANAGEMENT

In 1981, I made a promise to the American people "to limit Government to its proper role and make it the servant, not the master, of the people." My "Management Improvement Program: Reform '88" has helped make Government more efficient and more responsive. We reduced waste and fraud in Federal programs by combining the efforts of the inspectors general into the President's Council on Integrity and Efficiency, resulting in over $110 billion saved or put to better use—and their efforts are continuing.

I saw that the Federal Government did not have effective cash management practices for dealing with what is now a $2 trillion annual cash flow, nor did it have a government-wide credit management program for what is now a $1 trillion portfolio. This resulted in the waste of billions of dollars each year. We built the necessary government-wide controls in both areas and stopped the drain.

Moreover, we began the establishment of the first government-wide financial accounting system, consolidating and making uniform over 400 previously incompatible individual agency systems. This was essential for any well-managed government, and is presently being implemented.

The Federal Government has a major effect on our daily lives through the collection of taxes and fees, the direct provisions of services, the payment of financial assistance through various entitlement programs, and the regulation of commercial enterprises. Through modernization, improved administration, and automated services the Government has made substantial reductions in the time it takes to provide services to the public. As the 21st century approaches, the Federal Government must adapt its role in our society to changing conditions and changing technology. At the turn of the century, the U.S. population will exceed 268 million, with a larger proportion of elderly citizens. Changes in technology and communication will increasingly link the world's economies, trade, capital flows, and travel as never before.

The 1990 Management Report, which is being forwarded to the Congress as part of the 1990 budget submission, reflects the highlights of OMB's report to me on "Government of the Future." That Management Report has been expanded as a beginning to a planning process that has, in part, shaped the proposals in this budget and should become a part of the annual budget process.

BUDGET PROCESS REFORM IS DESPERATELY NEEDED TO CONTINUE DEFICIT REDUCTION

The persistence of the budget deficit is overwhelming evidence that the Federal budget process is fundamentally flawed. Past efforts at "reform" have been directed largely toward protecting a large portion of domestic spending from real fiscal discipline. Fourteen years after passage of the Congressional Budget Act and three years after enactment of the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act, the Federal budget process remains unwieldy and undisciplined. The American people expect better of their political system, and they deserve it.

Under the Congressional Budget Act, Congressional budget resolutions—Congress' proposed budgets—are passed each year. They are not sent to the President for approval and, therefore, are not law. They provide guidance to the committees of Congress, but the guidance is often late and ambiguous. The resolutions are usually passed well after the dates required by law, and well after they are needed by the finance, authorizing, and appropriations committees. Moreover, there is little agreement within Congress on the guidance provided. The House of Representatives and the Senate do not agree, except in the most general terms, on the priorities implied by resolutions both have approved.

Except for last year's on-time performance, Congress' self-imposed budget deadlines have usually been missed, and massive continuing resolutions and reconciliation bills have been the rule rather than the exception. These large, cumbersome bills provide cozy hiding places for hundreds of special interest add-ons, which line-item veto authority would permit the President to challenge.

A number of changes in the budget process—most of which I have recommended before—are needed to instill budget discipline throughout the legislative process. I urge Congress to adopt the following measures:

Balanced budget amendment.—I remain committed to and urge approval of a constitutional amendment requiring a balanced budget. The amendment should require a supermajority vote (at least 60 percent) in the Congress to increase taxes.

Line-item veto.—My successors should be given the authority, subject to Congressional override, to veto line-items in annual appropriations bills, in authorizing legislation that provides or mandates funding for programs, and in revenue bills. Such authority would permit the elimination of substantial waste and would be an effective instrument for enforcing budget discipline.

Enhanced rescission authority.—To enhance the President's ability to control Government spending, I recommend that line-item veto authority be complemented by a change in law that would require the Congress to vote "yea" or "nay" on any rescission proposed by the President. Current law allows the Congress to duck responsibility by simply ignoring proposed rescissions for 45 days.

Biennial budgeting.—The annual budget process consumes too much time and energy. A biennial budget would reduce the repetitive budget tasks, allow more time for considering key spending and revenue decisions, provide less scope for gimmicks that give the illusion of "savings," such as shifting spending from one year to another without affecting the underlying programs, and permit the realization of real savings that would be possible with a more assured availability of funds. For these reasons, I recommend that biennial budgeting be adopted.

Joint budget resolution.—To ensure the broader scrutiny and stricter discipline that is needed in the congressional budget process, I propose that Congress be required to prepare a budget resolution covering a minimum of two years showing revenue proposals individually and showing spending priorities. The Congress should also be required to submit its budget resolution to the President for his signature or veto. Subsequent legislation which exceeds these allocations should not be considered without super-majority approval.

Individual transmittal of appropriations bills.—The practice of transmitting full-year continuing resolutions covering a number of appropriations bills does not permit the Legislative and Executive Branches to exercise proper scrutiny of those bills. Too often in the past, such continuing resolutions have provided convenient cover for special-interest spending that would not survive close scrutiny. To minimize this risk, I propose that appropriations bills be transmitted individually to the President.

Credit reform.—The effects of credit activities are recorded imperfectly under current budget accounting. The subsidy component of Federal lending programs remains hidden.

To correct this major fault in the budget system, I recommended credit reform legislation two years ago. This legislation, which I am recommending again, would measure the true cost—the present value—of the subsidies provided by Federal credit programs and put that cost on an expenditure basis equivalent to the cost of other Federal programs. This change must be an integral part of the reform of the budget process.

Measuring the effects of budget proposals.—Budget discipline and lasting deficit reduction would be facilitated if the Legislative and Executive Branches were to use a common set of principles for scoring budget proposals and actions on them. I urge that the Congressional Budget Office and the Office of Management and Budget be charged with the responsibility to develop, in consultation with the budget, finance, authorizing, and appropriations committees, a common set of budget scoring principles for use by the Legislative and Executive Branches.

Adoption of these reforms should enable the Federal Government to make informed decisions in a deliberate fashion that fosters rational priorities. The American people deserve no less from their elected representatives.

CONCLUSION

The accomplishments of the American people in the past eight years will always be for me a source of pride. However, we must continue our recent progress in reducing the Federal deficit.

Deficit reduction is a key national priority, written into law by the G-R-H Act, which, despite its defects, legislated a process to achieve a balanced budget.

This budget achieves the 1990 target of the amended Act, and projects a budget balance in 1993. It preserves legitimate programs for the aged and needy, provides for adequate national security, devotes more resources to other high-priority activities, and accomplishes all this without raising taxes. Tax increases are not needed. History shows that they would simply be used by the Congress to increase spending. Tax increases have been overwhelmingly voted down in the last three Presidential elections.

I call upon the Congress to enact this budget. Higher taxes are not needed—as this budget demonstrates—but genuine deficit reduction through moderating the growth in spending is essential to enable the next Administration and Congress to address the Nation's agenda for the future.

Over the past eight years, we Americans have made our world a safer place for freedom because we had the will to reinvigorate our economy, rebuild our defenses, and provide for the less fortunate among us. Together, we achieved a new beginning for our country and prepared the way for the next Administration to build on our accomplishments.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The following petitions and memorials were laid before the Senate and were referred or ordered to lie on the table as indicated:

POM-1. A concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Louisiana; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

"SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION. No. 14

"Whereas, the Soil Conservation Service of the United States Department of Agriculture provides technical assistance to private landowners through cooperative agreements between the landowners and local soil and water conservation districts; and

"Whereas, local conservationists work with participating landowners to assess the problems on their property and to develop comprehensive conservation plans to protect wetland resources; and

"Whereas, local districts have the only resource management programs of this type available to individual wetland landowners; and

"Whereas, most of Louisiana's marshland is privately owned, making cooperation with private landowners an essential tool in preserving and restoring the state's vanishing wetlands; and

"Whereas, landowners have signed cooperative agreements on approximately two and one-half million of the over three million acres of coastal marsh area in Louisiana, with conservation plans currently developed for about 700,000 acres; and

"Whereas, several watershed projects are also underway in Louisiana, involving measures to protect, develop, and utilize land and water resources in small watersheds; and

"Whereas, federal participation in these projects is limited to technical assistance, no monies having been budgeted for federal cost share to implement recommended restoration structures at Bayou Penchant in Terrebonne Parish or Bayou L'Ours in Lafourche Parish; and

"Whereas, if the referenced watershed projects were implemented, more than one hundred seventy-six thousand acres of coastal marsh would be restored; and

"Whereas, although federal start-up monies were authorized for the Golden Meadow Plant Materials Center, no annual operations funding has been authorized for that facility; and

"Whereas, annual operations funding would allow accelerated vegetation plantings in critical wetland erosion areas; and

"Whereas, the total budget for the Soil Conservation Service in Louisiana in Fiscal Year 1988 was a mere $536,000 less $125,000 reimbursed from the Department of Natural Resources, an amount which is clearly inadequate for the high priority needs that exist in the coastal area; and

"Whereas, funding requirements of the Soil Conservation Service often place upland conservation programs and funding at a higher priority than work in the wetlands; and

"Whereas, it is in coastal Louisiana that a portion of shoreline and wetlands equivalent to the size of a football field is disappearing every fifteen minutes: Therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Legislature of Louisiana memorializes the Congress of the United States to provide that erosion control in coastal wetlands be elevated within the United States Department of Agriculture's Soil Conservation Service to the same level of priority as erosion control in upland areas and to provide funding commensurate with that change in policy, all for the purpose of reducing the rapid rate of coastal land loss in Louisiana: Be it further

"Resolved, That the Legislature of Louisiana also memorializes the Congress of the United States to accomplish the following with respect to these enumerated projects:

"Whereas, the marshlands serve as the first line of protection for our coastal communities and their two million residents and an extensive inland navigation system and deep water ports built by state and federal governments; and

"Whereas, the marshlands are disappearing due to natural activities which include subsidence and sea level rise estimated at 0.5 inches a year; and

"Whereas, the marshlands are also disappearing due to human activities which include construction of: flood control levees along the Mississippi River preventing freshwater and sediment from overflowing and rebuilding the marshlands; Mississippi River Ship Channel for navigation which directs river sediment into deep waters of the Gulf of Mexico where the sediment is lost; and thousands of miles of oil and gas pipelines which are needed to carry these fuels from offshore areas to northern markets disects the marshes; and

"Whereas, together, the natural and human activities have caused 1.4 million acres of Louisiana's marshlands to disappear in the last eighty years: Therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Legislature of Louisiana memorializes the Congress of the United States to direct the implementation of Section 907 of the Water Resources Development Act of 1986 to ensure that in the economic evaluation the benefits attributable to measures be deemed at least equal to the costs of such measures: Be it further

"Whereas, Louisiana's marshlands serve as the first line of protection for our coastal communities and their two million residents, for our extensive inland navigation system and deep water ports built by the state and federal government, and for the freshwater supply for our coastal communities, industries, and agriculture; and

"Whereas, our marshlands are disappearing as a result of natural activities, including subsidence and sea level rise estimated at 0.5 inches per year, and human activities which include the construction of flood control levees along the Mississippi River which prevents freshwater and sediment from overflowing and rebuilding the marshlands, Mississippi River Ship Channel for navigation directs river sediment into deep waters of the Gulf of Mexico where the sediment is lost, 8,200 miles of navigation, drainage and irrigation canals segments the marshes; and thousands of miles of oil and gas pipelines which are needed to carry these fuels from offshore areas to northern markets disects the marshes; and

"Resolved, That the Legislature of Louisiana memorializes the Congress of the United States to amend the Water Resources Development Act of 1986 (Public Law 99-662) to amend Section 1155 of that Act to include the following:

" 'The Congress finds that Louisiana's coastal marshlands provide benefits that are of national importance but the marshlands are disappearing, and that the Federal flood control and navigation projects on the lower Mississippi River are preventing river water and sediment from nourishing the marshlands. It is in the public interest to enhance the environment by restoring Louisiana's coastal marshes. Such environmental improvements are deemed to be a co-equal purpose with the flood control and navigation projects on the lower Mississippi River. The non-Federal share of the cost of enhancement projects constructed under this Section shall be twenty-five percent, except where such projects affect publicly owned wildlife refuges, in such cases the first cost shall be all federal. The authorization for projects constructed under Section 1155 is extended through fiscal year 1994. In the five year period, the Secretary is directed to construct environmental enhancement projects by modifying the following projects:

" '(1) Mississippi River and Tributaries Project, LA. (Flood Control Act of 1928) The Secretary is directed to implement a program of marsh creation projects that would use low crested-weirs to divert sediment-laden Mississippi and Atchafalaya River waters below the Old River Control Structure into coastal marshes and water bodies, and marsh restoration projects that would use control structures to divert fresh water from the Mississippi and Atchafalaya Rivers below the Old River Control Structure into coastal marshes and water bodies. $30,000,000 is authorized to be appropriated for each of fiscal years 1990, 1991, 1992, 1993 and 1994 to carry out this work:

" '(2) Mississippi River Ship Channel, Gulf to Baton Rouge, LA Project (Supplemental Appropriation Act for FY 1985, PL 99-88). The Secretary is directed to build marsh creation projects by pumping material dredged from the navigation channel into coastal marshes and water bodies. $15,000,000 is authorized to be appropriated for each of fiscal years 1990, 1991, 1992, 1993 and 1994 to carry out this work; and

" '(3) Gulf Intracoastal Waterway, LA Section (River and Harbor Act of 1946). The Secretary is directed to build marsh creation projects by pumping material dredged from the navigation channel into coastal marshes and water bodies, and marsh restoration projects that would divert fresh water from the GIWW into the marshes and water bodies in the vicinity of mile 225. $5,000,000 is authorized to be appropriated for each of fiscal years 1990, 1991, 1992, 1993 and 1994 to carry out this work': Be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this Resolution be transmitted to the Secretary of the United States Senate and the Clerk of the United States House of Representatives and to each member of the Louisiana congressional delegation."

"Whereas, while the fate of prisoners of war and those listed as missing in action during the Vietnam era has been a matter of great concern to the American public, there is also compelling evidence that there could be thousands of American citizens who are casualties of our long and bitter cold war with the Soviet bloc who have been all but forgotten; and

"Whereas, recently uncovered documents from the National Archives suggest that thousands of prisoners of war, including Americans, may have vanished in the Soviet gulag at the close of World War II. There is evidence that the Soviets reneged on a negotiated agreement with the United States and Great Britain to exchange liberated prisoners of war;

"Whereas, further startling revelations involve eyewitness accounts of a special prison camp deep within the Soviet Union which is used to house American prisoners of war from World War II and the Korean Conflict and other American military personnel captured in isolated incidents involving U.S. patrol planes shot down by the Soviets during the cold war; and

"Whereas, while the entire international community, and the United States in particular, looks to the current changes in the Soviet Union with great anticipation and a renewed sense of hope, it would be unconscionable to allow this situation to continue without speaking out. Indeed, it is in this spirit that we implore the United States Congress and the United States Department of State to undertake a thorough investigation of this human rights tragedy and to take the necessary steps to obtain a full and accurate accounting of these serious allegations; now, therefore, be it.

"Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That we hereby memorialize the United States Congress and the United States Department of State to conduct an investigation into the matter of American citizens being held prisoner in the Soviet Union and its satellites; and be it further

"Whereas, the Jews remaining in Ethiopia are a vulnerable community consisting mostly of women, children, and the elderly and infirm threatened by famine and disease; and

"Whereas, Ethiopian Jews continue to face religious persecution: Jewish studies and the teaching of Hebrew are forbidden, community leaders are questioned and arrested, and the special permission required for holiday gatherings is often denied; and

"Whereas, approximately 30 Ethiopian Jews have been arrested and imprisoned for attempting to emigrate or help others emigrate to Israel; and

"Whereas, sixteen thousand Ethiopian Jews now live outside of Ethiopia due to the courageous efforts of Operation Moses; and

"Whereas, the right of emigration is a fundamental human right, especially where it concerns family reunification; now, therefore, be it

THE INAUGURATION

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, the inauguration of the President and Vice President occurred today on the west front of the Capitol. The simple yet moving ceremony symbolizes one of the greatest strengths of our democracy—the peaceful transition of power. I join the distinguished Republican leader in extending our congratulations to the new President and Vice President. The President's statement was eloquent, moving, forthcoming, and we intend to reciprocate the hand of friendship.

The program lasted for about 1 hour, but countless hours were spent on logistics, construction of the platform, ticket distribution, preparation for the luncheon in Statuary Hall, and many other tasks. Many people worked on the preparation for the inauguration but the chairman of the Joint Congressional Committee on Inaugural Ceremonies, the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, Mr. FORD, carried the major burden of making the arrangements for this historic occasion. He performed his responsibilities with his characteristic good humor, fairness, and efficiency. I offer my congratulations to Senator FORD on a job well done. He even managed to contol the weather.

I would also like to thank the other members of the Joint Inaugural Committee: the Senator from Alaska, Mr. STEVENS; the Speaker of the House of Representatives; the majority leader, Mr. FOLEY; and the minority leader, Mr. MICHEL.

The executive director for the joint committee, Mike Ruehling, did a truly outstanding job. He was ably assisted by officers and employees of the Senate and the House of Representatives, as well as personnel from the executive branch.

Once again, I offer my appreciation and gratitude to everyone who worked on arrangements for the inauguration. The tireless efforts of all involved, particularly those of the chairman, Mr. FORD, resulted in a memorable event for the entire Nation.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE HONORABLE RICHARD A. ENSLEN, U.S. DISTRICT JUDGE, REGARDING OATH OF OFFICE ADMINISTERED TO REPRESENTATIVE-ELECT HOWARD WOLPE

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Honorable Richard A. Enslen, U.S. District Judge, Western District of Michigan:

U.S. DISTRICT COURT,
Grand Rapids, MI, January 4, 1989.

The HONORABLE JIM WRIGHT, SPEAKER,
U.S. House of Representatives, H-209, The Capitol, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: On January 3, 1989, you designated me to administer the oath of office to Representative-elect Howard Wolpe, of the Third District of the State of Michigan, under House Resolution 8, One Hundred First Congress.

Under such designation, I have the honor to report that on January 3, 1989, at Kalamazoo, Michigan, I administered the oath of office to Mr. Wolpe. Mr. Wolpe took the oath prescribed by 5 U.S.C. 3331. I have sent two copies of the oath, signed by Mr. Wolpe, to the Clerk of the House.

Yours very truly,

RICHARD A. ENSLEN,
U.S. District Judge.

REMEMBERING DR. KING

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HOYER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, last week, we commemorated the struggle for human dignity, the life of Dr. Martin Luther King and the civil rights movement that he symbolizes.

Dr. King spoke often of the " * * * true neighbor lifting some bruised and beaten brother to a higher and more noble life."

In that one sentence, he captured the essence of a long struggle. Dr. King coupled nonviolent direct action with the irresistable power and energy of moral courage and outrage.

The national holiday celebrating Dr. King's birth recalls a movement that defined a volatile period in our history. More importantly, the civil rights movement and Dr. King's brand of leadership may yet help liberate all Americans from the tyranny of racism.

The spiritual and moral force of the movement, the dynamism and commitment of its leadership, and even the important victories won in the early days of that yet unfinished struggle are not peculiarly American.

But Dr. King does symbolize our unique struggle to come to terms with our history, to come to terms with the fact that millions of Americans share the experience of racial injustice—as the children of both slaves and slave-holders.

The burden of our history—the burden of segregation, of racism and injustice—remains. But the civil rights movement, if truly understood, stands as a definition of what is best and most honorable in us all.

Washington, Jefferson, Adams—these are names that have come to represent the essence of American democracy. In the service of democratic ideals, these people helped create a new system of government 200 years ago.

The American Revolution resulted in a Constitution and a national ethic dedicated to protecting the individual from the excesses of both the government and a tyrannical majority.

Unfortunately, our Constitution and the laws that our elected Representatives enacted were imperfect reflections of the principles and ideals upon which they were founded.

But as in no other era the civil rights movement clearly challenged us to rectify the basic contradictions between practice and principle, between ideal and law in American society.

Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. challenged the America that dehumanized him and millions like him to become the America we all read about in the Constitution and the Declaration of Independence—the America he dreamed about.

The civil rights movement was not an man's struggle.

But there is no doubt that man's dream helped catalyze the idealism and commitment of an entire generation in this Nation. It was a generation appalled by the hypocrisy of Jim Crow, the bombings in Montgomery, and the beatings in Birmingham.

It is my sincere hope that as we celebrate Dr. King's birthday in the years to come that we are all reminded that the struggle for human dignity continues.

IN HONOR OF COL. THOMAS NAPOLITAN

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to commend one of our country's truly outstanding and dedicated military officers, Col. Thomas W. Napolitan, Air National Guard. He entered the service in March 1958 as an aviation cadet and received his commission and pilot rating in June 1959. He was awarded a regular commission, and served on active duty as a Strategic Air Command B–47 pilot until December 1963. After leaving active duty, he served as a traditional guardsman in the Illinois Air National Guard for 17 years. From June 1964 until May 1981, he was a member of the 183rd Tactical Fighter Group, Springfield, IL, and flew the F–84F, F–4C, and F–4D. His duties included instructor pilot, senior flight commander, chief of operational training, and chief of the operations center. In May 1981 Colonel Napolitan was selected for full time extended active duty as an Air National Guard Advisor in the Pentagon.

From May 1981 until September 1983, he served in the Organization of the Joint Chiefs of Staff for the Deputy Director for Operations Reconnaissance, Space, Electronic Warfare and C3 Countermeasures. In addition to his role as the Reserve Forces Advisor, he was the JCS primary point of contact for plans, force development, and operations regarding reconnaissance in support of U.S. nuclear policy. He was also the primary coordinator for plans and reconnaissance operations in JCS exercises, and served as the Joint Reconnaissance Center briefing officer.

From September 1983 to May 1986, he served as the Air National Guard Advisor to Headquarters USAF Directorate of Operations. He was the director's principal advisor on all Air National Guard matters, and served as the primary liaison between the National Guard Bureau and the active Air Force operations staff. He was also responsible for mobilization of the Air National Guard and Air Force Reserve during crisis actions.

From May 1986 to present, has served as the Air National Guard assistant to the Deputy Assistant Secretary of the Air Force for Reserve Affairs. His primary duties include advising the Air Force Secretariat Staff on all Air National Guard matters, including personnel, operations, legislation, and foreign affairs. He is designated to represent the Air Force Secretariat Staff on the Secretary of Defense's Crisis Action Council.

He has a bachelor's degree in psychology, a master's degree in psychological counseling, and postgraduate training in family therapy. Concurrently with his previous part-time traditional guardsman activities, his full time civilian positions as a mental health practitioner included service with: Illinois Department of Corrections, Youth Division, St. Charles; Mercy Center, Aurora, family and adolescent counselor; Tri-City Family Project, Geneva, family therapist and program director (Illinois Law Enforcement Commission grant); Niles family service, consultant and educator for school and family program; Human Relations Services, Elgin, executive director.

Colonel Napolitan will again protect us as one of 114,595 air guardsmen in our country.

Mr. Speaker, I ask to enter into the RECORD our commendation and sincere appreciation to Col. Thomas W. Napolitan for his outstanding and dedicated service to his State, the Congress, his commander in chief, and our country. Colonel Napolitan is the best of our country's citizen airmen.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

THE DEFICIT CRISIS—PRESERVING THE NATION'S FUTURE

HON. LEON E. PANETTA
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 20, 1989

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, January 17, I had the privilege of addressing the National Press Club. My subject was our Nation's budget deficit and the challenge and opportunity it represents to our Nation and its leadership. I would like to include the text of my speech in the RECORD at this time in the interests of my colleagues who may wish to read it. As we begin a year when the deficit will occupy a great deal of our time and energies, I hope my remarks will provide some background and some guidance as we face the difficult choices before us.

Following is the text of my address:

THE DEFICIT CRISIS—PRESERVING THE NATION'S RESOURCES

It is a great honor for me to have the opportunity to address this historic institution—the National Press Club. It is particularly appropriate since you have been designated as one of the Congress' infamous partners in the Iron Triangle.

It is a comforting thought to know that you are equally responsible for the federal deficit. Whether that is true or not is subject to debate. What is not a matter of debate is the fact that in our democracy, we are partners in making our system of government work.

An informed public is a crucial ingredient of a free society. We in government must never fear the truth, and you in the press must never fear to reveal the truth to the American people. Together, we form not an iron triangle, but the strong infrastructure of a vibrant democracy.

It is in this spirit that I share with you my thoughts about the federal budget deficit—an issue that represents the primary challenge, opportunity, and test of leadership for our nation today.

Our future is dependent on the strength of our economy; the strength of our economy is dependent on resources; and our resources are dependent, in large measure, on our ability to manage our budget properly.

In his book, "The Rise and Fall of the Great Powers," the historian Paul Kennedy tracks the history of the major powers since the 1500's. Whether one contemplates the history of Imperial Spain, Napoleon's France, the British Empire, Bismarck's Prussia, Japan, Germany, the United States, or others, there is a common theme that runs throughout history: nations rise to power by virtue of their ability to possess, develop, and accumulate resources, and they decline in power when they fail to manage those resources properly.

The issue raised by the book which confronts all of us is, where in this cycle is the United States today? Are we in decline by virtue of our inability to manage our resources, or are we willing to make the tough choices necessary to conserve our resources and deploy them effectively and equitably now and in the future?

The most disturbing evidence of our inability to manage these resources properly is the growth of our federal debt. During the last eight years, we have seen eight consecutive 12-digit deficits. The federal debt, the accumulation of all our budget deficits, has nearly tripled since 1980. The debt subject to limit now stands at 2.6 trillion dollars and counting.

It is likely that this year, the Administration will request, and the Congress will have to approve, an increase in the federal debt ceiling beyond 2.8 trillion dollars to accommodate the continuing deficits.

Who is to blame for these deficits? Democrats? Republicans? Congress? President Reagan? The Iron Triangle? Frankly, this nation could never have reached a $2.6 trillion federal debt without the cooperation of most of these institutions. Both political parties, and past and present Administrations and Congresses, have had their favorite spending programs. And, to the extent that government has reflected the contradictory desires of the American people, who want critical defense and domestic programs but do not particularly want to pay for them, all of us share the blame.

And why not? It's a hell of a deal. National security, social benefits, and all other Federal spending for about 85 cents on the dollar. Is it any wonder that some would argue that the deficit is not that serious a problem?

Jonathan Rauch, in this month's Atlantic Monthly, asks the question, "Is the Deficit Really So Bad?" After all, the sky has not fallen; there has been no immediate crisis. Both ends of the political spectrum, if forced to choose, would select deficits rather than do harm to their priorities. Conservatives forced to choose between taxes or defense cuts and higher deficits would choose deficits. Liberals forced to choose between domestic program cuts and deficits would choose deficits.

The result is that the deficit has not been at the top of the agenda for the nation's political leadership. President Reagan, for all of his talk about deficits and balanced-budget amendments, never once in eight years presented a balanced budget to the nation. He was the first to admit that he had other, more important priorities. Neither of the recent Presidential candidates really confronted the deficit issue except in the vaguest of terms—from an undefined "flexible freeze" to a speculative IRS enforcement windfall.

The consequence of all of this is a day-to-day mentality that says, get what you can today, and don't worry about tomorrow. We have been on a borrow, bail-out, and buy-out binge that pervades our society and puts our future economic security at risk. The current approach to the savings and loan crisis is the latest illustration of this attitude—borrow whatever is necessary today to put off the problem, regardless of the exposure to which it subjects the Treasury.

The fact is, this borrowing and these deficits are stealing the very resources our nation needs to continue economic growth, to invest, to produce, to improve our standard of living, and to address the critical problems we face in both defense and domestic areas, both now and in the future.

Our resources are endangered because we are borrowing from the future to pay for our current consumption.

We are borrowing from private saving. Despite the promises made by supply-side economists, net national saving has declined by two-thirds since the 1960's and '70's. Part of this is a decline in personal saving, which is exactly the opposite of what the supply-siders predicted. Our personal saving rate of three to five percent contrasts with Japan's 16 to 17 percent. The U.S. national saving average—the combination of private and public saving—has gone from an average of eight percent of the gross national product in the 1950's to just a little more than three percent in the 1980's. What saving we have is going to finance the deficit—lost capital for investment in our own society.

To replace this lost domestic capital, we are borrowing from foreign investors. We have borrowed close to 500 billion dollars and are now the largest debtor nation in the world. By the early 1990's, it is expected that we will have to borrow over one trillion dollars from abroad. The danger of this huge foreign indebtedness is that we are becoming increasingly dependent on the decisions of foreign investors for the stability of the dollar, and, for that matter, our economy.

We are borrowing from the nation's trust funds. Social security now has a surplus of 69 billion dollars, and is holding a reserve expected to peak at 12 trillion dollars in the year 2030. These funds are now, in effect, being lent to us through the Social Security Trust Fund's purchase of Treasury securities. This means that the federal fund's deficit, excluding social security, is not $155 billion in 1989 but actually in excess of 210 billion dollars. Ultimately, this borrowing must be paid back as the baby boomers reach retirement age. The present level of borrowing puts both the economy and the trust fund at risk.

The consequence of all this borrowing—from savings, from foreigners, from trust funds—is directly reflected in the budget in the form of expanding interest payments. This is really where the borrowing comes home to roost, and where the public ultimately feels the bite of lost resources. Today, close to 15 percent of the budget, almost 170 billion dollars, goes for nothing else but to pay lenders for the money our Treasury must borrow.

In very simple terms, this is 170 billion dollars that cannot be spent to improve our nation's defense, to educate our children, to train unemployed workers, to house low- and middle-income families, to fight the drug war, to repair our aging infrastructure, to clean up the environment, or to reduce the deficit.

The interest portion of the budget is the fastest growing part of the budget—having increased 145 percent in the last eight years. As it consumes more and more of the resource pie, there is increasing pressure on the remaining programs for survival, and there is a growing gap between our responsibilities and the resources available to meet them. The savings and loan crisis and the costly clean-up and improvement of our nuclear weapons facilities are only the most visible examples.

Added to these new emergencies are the societal deficits that continue to eat away at our social fabric: the tragic waste of children growing up in poverty without decent housing, nutrition, education, or hope; the growing health care needs of the elderly and those with no health care protection; the homeless; and those afflicted with AIDS or addicted to drugs.

If we agree that controlling the federal deficit is essential to our future economic security and our ability to respond to national priorities, why is it so difficult to accomplish? The reality is that the nature of the budget is such that there are only tough choices left.

A close look at the 1.1 trillion dollar federal budget shows that two-thirds of the budget goes to just four areas: defense, interest payments, social security, and medicare. If you add the remaining entitlement programs—medicaid, civil service and military retirement veterans' compensation and pensions, agricultural support payments, and additional programs serving the poor—some 84 percent of the budget is consumed by defense, entitlement, and interest on the debt. The remaining 16 percent is everything else: education, housing, transportation, health research, law enforcement, space, air safety, the homeless, and funds to operate the court system and government. This area of the budget has been cut in real terms by 18 percent over the last eight years.

Considering these budget realities, an effective deficit reduction proposal must of necessity involve a balance of spending constraints on defense and entitlements, along with additional revenues. Such an approach is both substantively and politically right, particularly when one considers the alternatives. And even the Reagan budget proposes significant new revenues.

Some suggest that it could all be done by raising taxes. But such an approach not only is politically impossible but the wrong taxes could undermine the economy.

Others say it could all come from cutting defense. This approach would not be supprted by either party and could cause untold harm to our nation's security.

Still others say it could all come out of domestic spending. That could mean a 20-percent cut in all domestic discretionary programs, from education to air safety. This approach has been in large measure proposed by the Administration and rejected overwhelmingly time and time again, by Republicans and Democrats alike.

We've heard a new variation recently on this theme—that in reducing the deficit through "spending restraint" in domestic programs, we would not really be cutting spending. We would only be "reducing the increase" that would otherwise take place.

The reality is this: if inflation or other factors force up the cost of a program, and you don't increase spending to keep up, you have to cut real services. That's a spending cut. It's like your family budget. If the price of food increases by five percent, and your pay goes up only enough to increase your grocery spending by two percent, you may be spending more, but you'll be eating less. Government is no different. Let's at least be honest about that.

What about taking it all out of entitlements? That means deep cuts in social security. Enough said about that.

What about letting Gramm-Rudman take effect with its arbitrary cuts across the board—50 percent out of defense and 50 percent out of certain domestic programs? For Fiscal Year 1990, this could mean cuts of more than 15 billion dollars in each area. This prospect makes for great tough talk, but it is a consequence both substantively and politically intolerable.

And then there's the old smoke-and-mirrors approach: use very optimistic projections about the future of the economy and you may not have to cut spending or raise taxes at all. After all, one percentage point in lower interest rate projections can give you much as 10 billion to 11 billion dollars in deficit reduction. That's a hell of a lot easier than cutting programs or raising taxes. But a failed projection ultimately inflicts greater pain than spending cuts or tax hikes, because the fantasy is shattered by increasing deficits.

And finally, there is the suggestion that process changes alone can solve the problem. But there is no Constitutional amendment or procedural change that guarantees the will or courage to make tough choices.

There is no easy approach, and that's why a balanced deficit reduction package makes the most sense.

The problem is not the substance of deficit reduction. The problem is politics. Each party has postured itself in opposition to touching certain areas of the budget, and in doing so, has successfully forced the other party to pay a heavy political price. Most of us have an image of the Republicans opposing all tax increases and all efforts to slow down defense spending, and Democrats opposing all cuts in domestic programs. But these images do not necessarily coincide with the facts.

Fact: Ronald Reagan has signed 11 bills over the last seven years which have raised taxes by 581 billion dollars through 1989. Even the final Reagan budget contains over 13 billion dollars in new revenues, including over seven billion dollars in new taxes, user fees, and offsetting collections.

Fact: Republicans in Congress have generally agreed on the need to limit the growth in defense spending, and President Reagan has signed four appropriations bills with no real growth in defense, or even less.

Fact: Democratic Congresses have supported substantial cuts in domestic programs.

But party leaders believe it serves their parties' interest to emphasize their differences rather than their similarities. The result is stalemate, or only piecemeal steps where dramatic action is needed. Unfortunately, the last Presidential campaign only reinforced these images.

In a democracy, action occurs in one of two ways; through strong leadership or through crisis.

In 1987, crisis finally occurred. The Gramm-Rudman law threatened a 23-billion-dollar across-the-board cut, and on October 19, the stock market crashed. There was both economic and governmental crisis, and the result was the economic summit between the White House and the Congress. As a participant in that summit, I can tell you the final package was not as bold as some of us hoped, but there are several important lessons that emerged:

First, the agreement was bipartisan. There is no way the tough choices that need to be made can be made unless both political parties, the White House, and the Congress concur in the final package.

Second, the 76-billion-dollar package included each of the areas that are essential to an effective deficit-reduction proposal: savings in defense and entitlement spending and new revenues.

And lastly, the agreement stretched over two years. This helped restore a timely budget process to the country for the first time in 40 years. I am convinced that establishing funding targets over a two-year period allowed the Congress to pass each of its appropriations bills before the end of the last fiscal year, and that the absence of budget confrontation allowed both parties to cooperate on a series of successful legislative initiatives in the 100th Congress—from trade to hunger to welfare reform to drug enforcement.

The question is whether these lessons have been learned. Will budget decisions be made by crisis or through leadership? Will we need a stock market crash, a fall in the dollar, or a Gramm-Rudman deadline to bring us to our senses, or will a new Administration and a new Congress give us the opportunity to lead? Will we repeat the first years of the Reagan Administration, when disingenuous projections and bitter partisanship led to disastrous fiscal policy, or will we work together to resolve our differences and do what's right? This will be the first test of leadership for the new President and the new Congress.

The budget debate opened last week with the introduction of President Reagan's last budget. Like the eight which preceded it, this budget does not come close to being balanced. If offers a rosy projection of the economy, and it repeats the same old priorities of increasing defense spending while paying for that increase with drastic cuts in programs for people. It is not a budget that leads to the future. It is a last will and testament—an approach to the budget whose time has passed.

The principal focus now will be on the new President and his budget. He faces a tough challenge. He will have to reconcile the promises he made during the campaign with the realities of deficit reduction.

He promised a kinder and gentler America. He said he supported a new child care initiative, an expanded Headstart program, full funding for the McKinney Act to help the homeless, and a medicaid buy-in program for those without health care protection. None of these initiatives appears in the Reagan budget.

He promised to be the education President. He promised increased funding for magnet schools, merit awards to teachers, and funds for innovation and reform of schools and teachers. The Reagan budget eliminated 24 categorical programs and proposed reductions in the Government Student Loan Program.

He promised to be the environment President. He supported increased efforts to improve the environment. The Reagan budget eliminates grants and incentives for conservation.

He supported new incentives through tax cuts. His proposals included a drop in capital gains tax rates and special breaks for the oil and gas industry.

He supported growth in defense spending, no cuts in social security and a "read my lips" approach to new revenues.

Add all of this up . . . and it doesn't add up. Compromises will have to be made. But that should not be viewed as a failure; that is what the challenge of leadership is all about.

As Chairman of the House Budget Committee, I am prepared to work with the new President in this effort, to reach out not only to Democrats and Republicans in Congress but to President Bush as well to help resolve this deficit issue once and for all. A long-term compromise that gets us on the path toward lower deficits is possible. It can be done.

But it can happen only if there is a frank and honest assessment of budget realities. Appropriate signals must be sent in the new President's budget submission. Budgets are not just numbers and dollar signs; they are a statement about the priorities of a President and a nation. This nation, the Congress, and indeed the world will be watching how this new President confronts the following challenges:

Will he present a specific proposal—one which does not merely set broad goals but tells Congress in a detailed plan what his policies are for specific government programs?

Will Mr. Bush present a realistic budget—one that is based on economic projections which include attainable interest and growth rates?

Will he keep the tax increases and other revenue increases proposed by President Reagan? Will these fit his "read my lips" definition of new taxes?

Will he be a kinder and gentler President? Will he restore the deep Reagan cuts in such domestic programs as medicaid, school lunches, housing, and aid for the homeless?

Will he hold down defense spending to the level of inflation in order to afford other initiatives in day care, education, and the environment?

How will he provide for America's pressing and non-deferable needs—the savings and loan crisis, the nuclear weapons clean-up?

These are the tests by which we can judge the Bush budget. Is it specific? Is it realistic? Is it credible? And is it fair? If the Bush budget meets these tests, then I am convinced that a new period of cooperation between the President and the Congress will mark this new Administration.

In the end, the answer depends on which George Bush was elected President. Was it the confrontational, "read my lips" George Bush? Or was it the kinder, gentler George Bush, the environmentalist, the "thousand points of light" George Bush?

The initial signs have been positive. His cabinet appointments and his other appointments and statements, as well as his past history, provide us with something to go on. George Bush has always been a pragmatist. He believes in government and what it can accomplish. He now has the opportunity to deliver on his beliefs.

The stakes are high. The economic future of this country—what kind of life we want for ourselves, our children, and their children—depends on how we address the deficit issue.

If we continue to permit the deficit to eat away at this nation's resources, then economic stagnation or decline is sure to follow. Most of us live a more comfortable life than the generations which came before us—if not our parents, then certainly our grandparents. All of us would like to be able to say the same for our own children and grandchildren, that we helped to create for them a better life. But if we do not address this issue, future generations will say that we failed them. And they will be right.

If we do meet this challenge, we can look to the future with hope, with optimism. We have a lot to accomplish in this country. In a country where 20 percent of our children live in poverty, we have a lot to accomplish. In a country where major cities are choked by air pollution and new threats to our environment seem to arise almost daily, we have a lot to accomplish. In a country where millions of the elderly live in fear that long-term illness will deprive them of comfort and dignity in their final days, we have a lot to accomplish. In a country where young people are too often discouraged from performing service for their fellow citizens, we have a lot to accomplish. And in a country where we take satisfaction in 73 months of economic expansion while thousands of our fellow citizens, including a growing number of children, sleep outdoors in the bitter cold, we surely have a lot to accomplish.

But we can't hope to accomplish the fundamental long-term goals we envision for our country if we don't deal with this problem first. The deficit is the issue from which all others flow. Our success or our failure in dealing with the deficit will determine whether we have a chance to deal with these others.

If we can break from the past and join together in a spirit of bipartisanship, not only will the American people be grateful, but future generations will look back on this inauguration week as a historic time in America—a time when America not only decided to remain a great power but, more importantly, remain a government of, for, and by all people.

Thank you.

RESIDENTIAL MORTGAGE CREDIT FAIRNESS ACT

HON. DEAN A. GALLO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 20, 1989

Mr. GALLO. Mr. Speaker, today I am reintroducing the Residential Mortgage Credit Fairness Act on behalf of myself and 14 original cosponsors. If enacted, this bill would prevent a lender who guarantees a mortgage lock-in from escaping his commitment to the borrower.

Far too often, homebuyers or those refinancing their home loans are forced to accept loans costing far more than the amount for which they originally agreed. Under these circumstances, homebuyers have to come up with additional money at the last minute, surrender their deposit or legal fees, or give up their dreams of homeownership.

Under this bill, which amends the Truth and Lending Act, consumers will be protected from "mortgage rate shock." Lenders who have promised loan terms will be prohibited from using delays in the closing process to escape their promises. On the other hand, the bill does not punish lenders who clearly tell consumers that the interest rate or other terms are not guaranteed or lenders whose closings are held up by unreasonable consumer delays.

The Consumer Union, publisher of Consumer Reports magazine, believes that this "important legislation establishes basic rules of fair play in the mortgage lending market." I strongly agree with Michelle Meier of Consumers Union, who states "since lenders can control the application process, they are in the driver's seat when it comes to closing the loan. If rates rise during the application process, the lender can get out of the lock-in by holding up the closing date unitl the lock-in period has expired."

The Residential Mortgage Credit Fairness Act is fair to both lenders and borrowers. It does not force lenders to offer a lock-in, but those who do will have to honor their commitments. This legislation penalizes the bad apples in the lending industry who currently lure borrowers away from more scrupulous lenders by promising rates that they have no firm intention of honoring.

With this thought in mind, I once again ask my colleagues to join me and a number of our fellow Members in support of this legislation and to work for its passage so that financial institutions will no longer make promises they can't keep.

AIRLINER CABIN AIR QUALITY PROTECTION ACT

HON. JAMES L. OBERSTAR

OF MINNESOTA

Friday, January 20, 1989

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced the Airliner Cabin Quality Protection Act of 1989 to permanently prohibit smoking on domestic airline flights.

The Congress has already enacted, as part of the appropriations process, a 2-year ban on smoking on airline flights of 2 hours or less. That ban expires in April 1990. While initially there was great concern for the potential reaction to this ban—fears of fires in lavatories, rebellious smokers, massive resistance—the FAA reports only 18 enforcement incidents between enactment in April and July 2, 1988. I am confident that more up-to-date statistics would continue this virtually incident-free record.

While I supported that provision, I did so only as an interim step toward a long overdue, permanent ban on smoking on board aircraft, in view of the scientifically demonstrated, profound health risks to passengers and crew from passive smoking. There ought to be a prohibition on smoking on all domestic airline flights, whatever the duration of the flight. My bill would accomplish this purpose.

I have prepared a brief survey of the health, safety, and economic issues to be discussed in connection with this bill. I commend it to my colleagues' attention:

First, cigarette smoke can make a significant, measurable contribution to the level of indoor air pollution at levels of smoking and ventilation that are common in the indoor environment. This effect is exacerbated in enclosed environments such as airplanes, where air flow is further restricted. Nonsmokers have a right to a clean and smoke-free environment when they travel.

Second, nonsmokers who report exposure to environmental tobacco smoke have higher levels of urinary continine, a metabolite of nicotine, than those who do not report such exposure.

Third, cigarette smoke in the air can produce an increase in both subjective and objective levels of eye irritation. Further, some studies suggest that high levels of involuntary smoke exposure may produce small changes in pulmonary function in some subjects.

Fourth, in 1986, three reports bearing on the health risks of smoking aboard commercial aircraft were issued:

The congressionally mandated report on airline cabin air quality, issued in August, 1986 by the National Academy of Sciences, titled, "The Airliner Cabin Environment: Air Quality and Safety," recommended that for health and safety reasons all smoking aboard domestic commercial flights be prohibited.

The November 1986 National Academy of Sciences report on the health effects of involuntary smoking—Environmental Tobacco Smoke: Measuring Exposures and Assessing Health Effects—provided further scientific evidence about the health risks posed to nonsmokers on board aircraft when smoking is permitted anywhere in the passenger cabin.

The December 1986 study on involuntary smoking conducted by the Surgeon General further documented the dangers of environmental tobacco smoke.

Fifth, involuntary smoking is the cause of disease, including lung cancer, in healthy nonsmokers.

Sixth, the National Academy of Sciences found that the separation of smokers and nonsmokers in separate sections board airplanes does not protect all passengers and all flight attendants from exposure to tobacco smoke.

Seventh, the relatively low humidity aboard airplanes combined with the reduced fresh air flow aggravates passenger discomfort and irritation when air quality contaminants are present. Especially sensitive persons, such as asthmatics or those with allergies, may experience extreme discomfort and severe reactions to tobacco smoke exposure in the airliner cabin environment.

Eighth, cigarette smoking is responsible for many inflight fires, which pose a substantial threat to passenger and crew safety.

Ninth, the high concentration of smoke in the smoking section of a passenger cabin cannot be compensated for by increased ventilation, even if such an increase were economically feasible, which it is not.

Tenth, the airline industry is likely already benefiting from a ban on smoking aboard aircraft. The NAS study on airliner cabin air quality states that—

After a period of adjustment and with strict enforcement, prohibiting smoking should reduce on-board fire risk, cleaning costs and costs of replacing damaged materials. Removing tobacoo smoke from the aircraft environment would reduce cabin ventilation requirements and would result in additional fuel savings while reducing irritation and health risk.

These are some of the issues which should be discussed as we debate the merits of a complete ban on smoking aboard domestic aircraft.

I hope that the Public Works and Transportation Committee will move quickly to mark up and report to the House legislation to permanently prohibit smoking on all domestic airline flights.

NATIONAL BEVERAGE CONTAINER REUSE AND RECYCLING ACT

HON. PAUL B. HENRY

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 20, 1989

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, solid waste, particularly solid waste disposal, is an immediate, critical problem facing communities throughout the United States, as you know. Therefore, today I, along with Mr. WAXMAN, Ms. SNOWE, Mr. FORD of Michigan, Mr. KILDEE, Mr. MINETA, Mr. ACKERMAN, Mr. LEACH, Mr. SHAYS, Mr. BEILENSON, Mr. OWENS of New York, Mr. STUDDS, Mr. DEFAZIO, Mr. HOCHBRUECKNER, Mr. FRANK, Mr. MCHUGH, Mr. AUCOIN, Ms. PELOSI, and Mr. LIPINSKI, am introducing the National Beverage Container Reuse and Recycling Act—often referred to as the "national bottle bill."

There is certainly no one solution to the waste dilemma facing our Nation. However, this proposal is patterned after legislation that has proven effective in reducing solid waste, reducing energy consumption, creating jobs, and reducing roadside litter in 10 States across the country. It would prohibit the sale of carbonated soft drinks, beer, wine coolers, mineral water, or soda water in beverage containers unless such a container carried a refund or deposit value—which, at the time of purchase, would be paid by the consumer. Beverage retailers and distributors would be required to pay back that deposit when the containers are returned—thus creating a self-sustaining recycling network.

In the State of Michigan alone, a similar deposit law is responsible for a 7-percent reduction in the State's solid waste stream, $250 million in savings for landfill costs, 8,5 trillion Btu's in energy consumption savings, and a net increase of over 4,000 jobs.

Below, I have attached an article which appeared in the January issue of Michigan Out-of-Doors magazine. It provides a detailed history of the Michigan bottle bill that I hope will encourage my colleagues to support the National Beverage Container Reuse and Recycling Act in the 101st Congress. Mr. Speaker, the proven benefits of bottle deposit laws in States such as Michigan should clearly demonstrate to us that a national bottle bill is in the best interest of the entire Nation. It should be part of any serious proposal that comes from this body which is aimed at addressing our country's growing waste management problems.

MICHIGAN'S BOTTLE BILL—10 YEARS LATER

(By Richard L. Jameson)

While Proposal A drew lots of attention in the fall of 1988, it was Proposal A back in 1976 that was the headline issue.

Proposal A of 1976 was the ban on throwaway pop and beer containers spearheaded by the Michigan United Conservation Clubs.

More citizens cast votes on the "bottle bill" than for President in that hotly contested campaign.

In a bold move in April 1976, the MUCC Executive Committee voted to undertake a petition drive to legislate a ban on throwaway beer and soft drink containers. In eight previous public referenda around the country voters had rejected similar proposals to ban throwaways.

MUCC leaders were mindful of the difficulties in bucking the powerful beverage industry, but they were fed up with the growing litter and solid waste problems and inaction by the Legislature.

Bottle bills had been languishing in the Legislature for more than 10 years, thanks to well-heeled lobbyists from the beer, soft drink, container manufacturing, and related industries.

"We were at a stalemate," according to Rep. Lynn Jondahl, D-East Lansing, who authored the bottle bill language used by MUCC. "The Chamber of Commerce, industry, and labor lobbied againsts even having it brought up for a vote."

Despite the unqualified success of bottle bills in Oregon and Vermont, not many political observers gave much hope that a mandatory deposit bill would be passed in a large industrial state like Michigan.

Some encouragement came from a statewide poll in 1975 that showed a full 73 percent of Michigan citizens favored a ban on throwaways. And Gov. William G. Milliken strongly supported the proposal and publicly signed the first petition as MUCC began its initial attempt at citizen-launched legislation.

Perhaps the first real indication of the success story about to unfold occurred when MUCC collected a record 400,000 signatures in an intense six-week campaign. The beverage industry had underestimated the largest state conservation organization in the country.

MUCC's effort was joined by a broad coalition, including the Farm Bureau, garden clubs, West Michigan Environmental Action Council, Michigan Audubon Society, and others representing a sizable segment of Michigan's voting public. Gov. Miliken's unqualified endorsement led to many resolutions of support from various state boards and agencies. His environmental advisor, William Rustem, actually took a 10-week leave of absence to work for MUCC on the campaign.

The MUCC network of 400 conservation and sportsmen clubs gathered roughly 50 percent of the petition signatures. MUCC met the counterattack of the beverage lobby blow by blow. Additional staff was added, WATS lines installed, and a Detroit area office opened to capture the southeast Michigan vote.

Slick public relations campaigns by the industry were met by a grassroots campaign the likes of which Michigan had never seen. Voters were barraged with countless "vote no" ads on TV, radio, and in newspapers paid for by an industry-labor coalition called the Committee Against Forced Deposits.

Unable to afford expensive media time, MUCC printed circulars and fact sheets by the hundreds of thousands and distributed them through its 400 clubs and many cooperating organizations.

Strong editorial support from the state's media was also a definite factor in garnering public backing for returnable containers. Editorials against Proposal A were few and far between.

When all was said and done, Proposal A gathered 64 percent of the vote for a solid victory. Of Michigan's 83 counties, only four in the western Upper Peninsula had a majority opposed to the bottle bill, which took effect in 1978.

Here's a rundown on the results following the 10th anniversary of the implementation of Michigan's famous bottle law:

LITTER REDUCTION

While litter reduction may not be the most important result of the bottle bill, it was the issue that sold the people on supporting it and is the way that many people measure its success. According to the Michigan Department of Transportation, bottle and can litter decreased by 84 percent after the first year and more than 90 percent the second year. This corresponds to an estimate by the Michigan Public Service Commission that the return rate on deposit containers was about 95 percent. Whatever the actual figure, it is clear that deposits on beer and soft drink containers are an effective way to keep them off our roads, beaches, and lawns.

SOLID WASTE

While litter was the main topic of the debate, perhaps the most important result of the measure was the reduction of solid waste. "It was pure folly to be using billions of containers once and then landfilling them," says Thomas L. Washington, executive director of MUCC. The Michigan bottle bill is keeping some 4.7 billion soft drink and beer containers out of Michigan's overburdened landfills. Disposing of solid waste is now one of the biggest items of city and county budgets.

That seven percent reduction has saved Michigan citizens approximately $250 million since the bottle bill was implemented, according to Public Sector Consultants of Lansing, a highly respected research firm.

The reuse and recycling of billions of containers annually also represents a tremendous saving of raw materials. The metals, minerals, packaging, and other resources used by the beverage industry will be conserved for future generations.

The bottle bill successfully enlisted nearly all of Michigan's 9 million citizens into the biggest recycling effort in the state's history.

ENERGY REDUCTION

Reduction in solid waste also translates into substantial energy savings. Savings occur because it takes far less energy to reuse and recycle containers than it does to manufacture new containers from raw materials. An aluminum container from recycled material uses only 10 percent of the energy required to manufacture the same item from scratch.

Michigan's Public Service Commission estimates the bottle bill is saving approximately two-tenths of one percent of the annual energy budget of Michigan. This translates into 8.5 trillion BTUs or 65 million gallons of gas per year. Over the last 10 years, an impressive amount of energy has been saved equivalent to 650 million gallons of gasoline.

JOBS

While opponents claimed the bottle bill would cause massive unemployment, just the opposite occurred.

While there was a loss of a few hundred jobs in the container manufacturing sector, thousands of new jobs were created in the distribution, retailing, and recycling areas. The Public Service Commission calculated that Michigan's bottle bill caused a net increase of 4,174 jobs.

WINE COOLERS

With the introduction and rapid growth in popularity of wine coolers, MUCC requested the Liquor Control Commission to place deposits on these containers through the LCC's rule-making authority. The Beer and Wine Wholesalers were successful in blocking an LCC proposal to accomplish this. MUCC then launched a citizen-initiative drive to address the wine cooler issue, prompting the Legislature to adopt its own wine cooler deposit bill in October of 1986. The bill goes into effect June 1, 1989.

PUBLIC OPINION

As in Oregon, Vermont, and other bottle-bill states, Michigan deposit law has widespread support. Popular support roughly matches the return rate of containers. Ninety percent of Michigan's citizens supported the bottle bill in a 1987 poll conducted by the Mitchell Group. In other words, support for the bottle bill has grown from two-to-one when it first passed to nine-to-one years after it went into effect. As one legislator put it recently, the bottle bill "is a sacred cow and everyone must realize that it is untouchable."

THE FUTURE

The bottle bill made a significant dent in the area of resource conservation and solid waste, but the problem still persists.

Overpackaging, disposable items, and ever-increasing solid-waste generation still threaten our resource base and our expensive, overburdened landfills. Source reduction and recycling will need to be greatly expanded or we will bury ourselves in society's trash.

The bottle bill showed that citizens are willing to help solve these problems even if it means some inconvenience. A number of states with more serious problems than Michigan have instituted mandatory recycling statewide in an effort to reduce the solid waste stream as much as 75 percent. Eash Lansing, Ann Arbor, Holland, and other Michigan cities have undertaken extensive voluntary curbside recycling programs.

The recently passed Proposal C will make available some $150 million to develop alternatives to landfilling and markets for recyclables. The state's new Solid Waste Policy clearly mandates source reduction and recycling as the new direction to address this problem.

MUCC, as a follow-up to the bottle bill, is drafting legislation to earmark the unknown millions of dollars annually from unclaimed bottle and can deposits. According to a June 1988 study by Public Sector Consultants. Michigan consumers have lost between $260 million and $1.2 billion in unclaimed deposits. Since the beverage industry has no reporting requirements on deposits collected and returned, the estimates are based on figures from other bottle-bill states with reporting requirements.

While the beverage industry argues that it needs the money to offset handling costs, MUCC and others argue that consumers and the environment should benefit from these monies.

As Washington says. "The bottle bill was passed by Michigan citizens concerned about the environment, and the unclaimed deposits rightfully belong in environmental protection program that benefit our state."

REFLECTIONS ON MICHIGAN'S BEVERAGE CONTAINER LAW

"People who have traveled and compared Michigan to other states always comment how clean Michigan is and how lucky we are to have the bottle bill! Other evaluations such as the increase in recycling and energy savings are equally positive."—State Rep. Lynn Jondahl, author of the bottle bill.

"Our great state and local park system has been able to operate and maintain itself over the past 10 years without having to divert thousands of hours to picking up bottles and cans, let alone suffer health and safety problems."—John Greenslit, executive director, Michigan Parks and Recreation Association.

"The Legislature shouldn't be so reluctant to ask Michigan citizens to do their part in addressing environmental problems. People will rise to the occasion as demonstrated by the bottle bill."—Alex Sagady, former executive director, Michigan Student Environmental Confederation.

"Ten years after enactment of the beverage container deposit law, problems caused by the random throwaway of these containers have virtually disappeared. Rural roadsides and adjacent farm fields are clean except for random, widespread exceptions. The economic incentive of a nickel or dime to keep beverage containers in the recycling mainstream is working."—Al Almy, Michigan Farm Bureau.

"Bottle deposit legislation has been a high priority for the League of Women Voters ever since we adopted our solid waste management policy emphasizing waste reduction and recycling in the early 1970s. I now hear from one or more Leagues in other states each year inquiring how Michigan did it."—Connie Ferguson, natural resources chairperson. League of Women Voters of Michigan.

"The promises of the bottle bill have clearly been borne out by the history of the last 10 years. The mandatory recycling program—which is really all the bottle bill is—has proven effective in reducing solid waste, reducing energy consumption, creating jobs, and substantially reducing roadside litter. Michigan citizens are justifiably proud of their law, a step that has meant a cleaner and better Michigan both for us today and for future generations."—William R. Rustem, former environmental advisor to Gov. Milliken.

"If anyone wants to know how successful a bottle bill can be, all they need to do is to walk a trail or drive a highway in Michigan. We have shown here that a simple, painless approach to one of the most visible environmental problems can work remarkably well for everyone involved."—Ann Woiwode, Sierra Club.

"No other effort has demonstrated so clearly the public's desire and ability to protect the Michigan environment. The bottle bill and the Michigan Environmental Protection Act are the two crown jewels of environmental protection and citizen action."—Rich Newberry, West Michigan Environmental Action Council.

"There is no question that the bottle bill has cleaned up our shorelines, roadsides, and parks. The impact that this law has had has veen very apparent to me in my travels through various states. I'm proud to have been an active participant in the formation and passage of this law. It is a tribute to the conservation ethic of our citizens that this bill was so overwhelmingly accepted."—Former Gov. William G. Milliken.

HAZARDOUS MATERIALS TRANSPORTATION: THE NEED FOR A REGIONAL FLOW STUDY

HON. DEAN A. GALLO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 20, 1989

Mr. GALLO. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to require the Secretary of Transportation to conduct an analysis, by regions in the United States, of hazardous materials transportation incidents and the flow of hazardous materials on highways, water, and railroads.

Every year, more than 1.5 billion tons of gasoline and potentially hazardous materials, including chemicals, explosives, and hazardous waste, are transported across the United States.

However, no one Federal agency has the information necessary to properly oversee these shipments and establish workable Federal guidelines. The Federal Government must have more accurate information about the transportation of these dangerous materials.

Therefore, I am introducing this bill calling for a regional examination of commodity flow and accident data for hazardous materials transported on highways, water, and railroad. This information will enable the Department of Transportation, relevant State agencies, and emergency response teams to target enforcement efforts and training dollars, to determine whether specific routes should be designated as hazardous routes, identify accident "hot spots," and determine the appropriate number of first responders and necessary equipment required along major flow routes.

One area that also needs study is the current availability of moneys for first responder training. In September 1988, I requested the General Accounting Office to identify Federal moneys available for first responder training and I look forward to sharing their findings with my colleagues early in 1989.

I chose a regional approach in the legislation because the July 1986 report to Congress by the Office of Technology Assessment showed that the transportation of hazardous materials is largely a regional phenomenon. The average trip length for trucks hauling chemicals, for example, is 260 miles. Based on their comprehensive analysis, OTA concluded that "annual DOT summaries of aggregate regional shipments could provide useful regional and State commodity flow data."

In 1984, a flow study was conducted for the New York/New Jersey region by Mr. Raymond Scanlon, administrator of safety programs for the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey. Mr. Scanlon's study would be an excellent model for the work to be done under the provisions of my bill. This information needs to be brought together on all regions of the country and updated to the present situation.

My bill also requires the Secretary of Transportation to cooperate with other Federal agencies, States and hazardous materials shippers and carriers to improve commodity flow and accident data bases. At present, there are at least 12 Federal agencies and several private emergency response services that share responsibility for the safe transport of hazardous materials, but they do not share a common data base or communications system.

Under present law, the U.S. Department of Transportation is the lead agency for establishing and enforcing regulations on hazardous materials transportation. However, this Agency shares enforcement and related responsibilities with the Federal Highway Administration, the Federal Railroad Administration, the Federal Aviation Administration, the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration, the Coast Guard, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, the Environmental Protection Agency, the Occupational Health and Safety Administration, the Department of Energy, the Department of Defense, and the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Mr. Speaker, in the coming months, I expect that both the House Public Works and Transportation Committee and the House Energy and Commerce Committee will begin their consideration of a bill reauthorizing the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act. There are many issues that need to be addressed in the reauthorization. The findings of regional flow studies would help us address those issues.

GLOBAL POVERTY REDUCTION ACT

HON. MEL LEVINE

OF CALIFORNIA

Friday, January 20, 1989

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, today JOHN MILLER and I and over 60 of our colleagues are reintroducing the Global Poverty Reduction Act. This legislation, identical to legislation we introduced last year which had 194 cosponsors, seeks to target U.S. development assistance to eliminate the worst aspects of poverty throughout the world by the year 2000.

As we enter the final decade of this century, the progress we have made in previous years toward raising the standard of living for the world's poorest people is in serious jeopardy. A report just released by the U.N. Children's Fund states that for most of the countries of Africa, Latin America, and the Caribbean, "almost every economic signal points to the fact that development has been derailed." Even in countries with increasing per capita GNP, the poorest 40 percent of the population often receives a smaller share of the total, resulting in little or no improvement in standard of living for those on the bottom rungs of the economic ladder.

This legislation is designed to refocus U.S. development assistance to reduce the most devastating effects of poverty—particularly as it affects children. My bill targets three specific performance indicators which would be used to reflect the depth of poverty and the quality of life in developing countries. By focusing development assistance on improving these indicators, the United States can make measurable progress toward reducing malnutrition, disease, starvation, and poverty by the end of this century.

First, this legislation targets the goal of reducing the under five mortality rate for developing countries to less than 70 deaths for 1,000 live births.

Second, we have targeted the improvement of the female literacy rate to 80 percent by the end of this century. A great deal of research and even common sense indicate that declining population growth, the child survival rate, and the educational level of the next generation closely correlate with the rate of female literacy.

Finally, this legislation targets U.S. development assistance toward the goal of reducing the overall rate of overall poverty. Absolute poverty is defined as the income level below which a minimum nutritionally adequate diet—plus essential nonfood requirements, such as medical care—are not affordable.

These three performance indicators are acknowledged by international experts as among the most reflective of the condition of people living in absolute poverty.

The Global Poverty Reduction Act also directs the President to consult with the governments of developing countries, nongovernmental organizations, and international organizations to set additional goals and to devise a plan to utilize U.S. development assistance more effectively in the fight against poverty and hunger.

Additionally, this legislation recognizes the importance of environmental problems in the poverty cycle, and emphasizes the utilization of development activities which are consistent with maintaining and restoring the renewable natural resource base.

This bill proposes no new spending. Rather, it recognizes that in a time of increasingly tight budgets, it is all the more crucial that our foreign aid dollars are wisely spent. To measure the success of our development efforts, we must use specific and quantifiable goals. Such goals increase accountability and, even more importantly, ensure that we will be focusing on those targets most likely to reduce poverty, hunger, and disease among the world's poorest peoples.

I strongly urge my colleagues to join me in support of this important legislation.

TRIBUTE TO JAMES McCRORY

HON. LAMAR S. SMITH

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 20, 1989

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Speaker, today we honor the inauguration of a new President and prepare to start a new Congress.

At this time of "new beginnings," I would like to publically honor James McCrory, political writer for the San Antonio Express-News. Jim launches a "new beginning" of his own today as he retires from a 37-year journalism career.

I have had the privilege of working with Jim ever since my start in San Antonio politics 10 years ago, and have always been treated with fairness and honesty. As he retires, I want to wish this valued friend well.

Over the past 30 years, Jim has managed to interview every President since Harry Truman. While he has seen politics and journalism change with the ascension of broadcast media, he remains staunchly loyal to the importance of the print journalist's role.

But even as times changed, Jim McCrory's superior ability in political analysis did not. I have always admired and respected Jim for his capacity to get to the heart of a story quickly, clearly, and succinctly.

Jim's professionalism has made its mark on political reporting in San Antonio, and he should be proud to leave journalism improved by his participation.

PREVENTION OF PESTICIDE CONTAMINATION OF GROUND WATER

HON. JAMES L. OBERSTAR

OF MINNESOTA

Friday, January 20, 1989

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, today I have reintroduced the Ground Water Safety Act, which will help prevent and control contamination of ground water by pesticides.

For many years we assumed that, while surface waters were undeniably contaminated by many pollutants from point and nonpoint sources, our ground water was pure.

Now we find, wherever we look, that ground water has been contaminated as well, by landfills, waste disposal sites, and many other sources including, more and more, by pesticides.

To date, 26 States have detected 46 different pesticides in their well water, attributable to normal application rather than to spills or other causes.

In my own State of Minnesota, a recently completed test of 500 public and private drinking water wells indicates that pesticides and herbicides are present in 38 percent of the wells tested.

In hearings on ground water contamination by pesticides, held last year by the Public Works and Transportation Subcommittee on Investigations and Oversight, which I chair, one witness spoke of farmers' "chemical dependence" on agricultural chemicals, even though they know these can contaminate their family's drinking water. Some farmers, according to this witness, would be willing to see all agricultural chemicals banned, across the board, nationwide. Other witnesses talked of the increasing discovery of pesticides in ground water, and the costs of dealing with it.

We can't say, definitively, at this point, the true extent of the problem; but I predict that as EPA's well water survey continues, and reveals more and more wells contaminated by pesticides, the need for this bill will be evident.

The Ground Water Safety Act deals with the normal application of pesticides, rather than with spills or illegal uses. It makes the bridge between drinking water quality and pesticide application, first by determining which pesticides are likely to leach into which soils; and second by setting an action trigger at a very low health-based ground water contamination level. Under my bill, if a pesticide leaches, that leaching must be controlled. If it's found in drinking water, even at levels well below the health standard, its use can be sharply curtailed or banned in the immediate area before it threatens health.

The bill is thus protective and proactive.

The Resource: This bill protects not only those aquifers in use today, but those which could potentially be used in the future.

The Standard: The standard is the ground water residue guidance level [GRGL], which is set at the maximum contaminant level goal [MCLG], a purely health-based level under the Safe Drinking Water Act, if such has been promulgated. If the pesticide has been detected at three or more ground water sampling points, but has no GRGL, the GRGL is set at 5 micrograms per liter.

Leachers: The Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency is required, first of all, to establish criteria by which to determine whether a pesticide has the potential to leach into ground water. Pesticide registrants are then required to submit the necessary data from which EPA will determine whether that particular pesticide has leaching potential. If so, EPA can require the registrant to develop management practices to prevent leaching or, if necessary, refuse to register or reregister the pesticide. Any pesticide found at three or more ground water sampling points around the country is automtically determined to be a leacher.

Monitoring: If the pesticide has leaching potential, the registrant will be required to monitor ground water in areas where the pesticide is used. Monitoring results must be provided to EPA and the State.

Action: If EPA determines from the above or other information that the pesticide is likely to reach or exceed the GRCL: that is, it has been found at 25 percent of the GRGL in different parts of the country, EPA must amend the registration to prevent the level from being exceeded.

If a pesticide is found to reach or exceed 50 percent of the GRGL, either the State or EPA must take steps, including if necessary banning the use of the pesticide in the specific area of contamination, to prevent the contamination level from reaching or exceeding the GRGL. EPA may also order the registrant to provide water treatment facilities or alternative water supplies, and take other abatement actions.

State Programs: The bill also establishes State programs to prevent pesticide contamination of ground water, and provides $25 million a year for these programs.

The Nonpoint Source Connection: Contamination of ground water by normal application of pesticides is a nonpoint source problem. However, nonpoint source practices have long been suspected of aggravating or even causing ground water problems. For instance, conservation tillage or no-till, which help prevent erosion and the escape of pesticides, herbicides, and nutrients into surface water, may require increased application of pesticides, which then remain on the land and can leach into ground water. The ability to predict and control or prevent pesticide leaching, and management practices developed therefrom, would be an invaluable addition to nonpoint source [NPS] management practices.

Compounding the potential problem, while the NPS management programs will usually be housed in the water divisions of State environmental protection agencies, pesticide control programs may well be lodged in State agriculture departments.

It is imperative to bring the resources to be protected, and their management agencies and programs, together on the ground, in practice.

My bill therefore amends section 319 of the Clean Water Act, nonpoint source management programs, to assure that these two programs become compatible and mutually supportive.

Section 4 of this bill requires EPA to encourage consultation between State agencies or agency subdivisions, and coordination between programs. It further requires those States where pesticides are a substantial ground water problem to assure that information developed under this bill reaches the NPS agency, and that the NPS program's best management practices [BMP's] reflect this bill's pesticide management practices. Section 4 also permits use of NPS funds to incorporate pesticide control measures into section 319's technical assistance, financial assistance, education, training, technology transfer, and demonstration projects.

Finally, I have provided $5 million a year to EPA to assist in developing management practices that will protect both surface and ground water resources from pesticide contamination.

Mr. Speaker, it truly seems that, in the case of ground water contamination, if we seek, we find it. Treatment is in many cases impracticable, and in some cases impossible, leaving the farm family with the choice of drinking contaminated water, or purchasing bottled water, and even possibly losing the value of their home and farm.

An aquifer once destroyed is destroyed almost in perpetuity. The only course is prevention.

The Ground Water Safety Act is needed now, before more ground water resources are lost or contaminated. I will join with any and all who share this goal, to achieve its enactment at the earliest moment.

MARTIN LUTHER KING DAY CELEBRATED IN ATTLEBORO, MA

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 20, 1989

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, those of us who strongly supported the establishment of a holiday to honor the work and life of Dr. Martin Luther King were especially pleased last week to be able to attend community ceremonies in honor of Dr. King.

I was privileged to be invited to participate in the city of Attleboro, where a committee of citizens from the Greater Attleboro area did a superb job of putting together a ceremony at city hall, and a celebration afterward at the Centenary United Methodist Church in Attleboro. I wish to congratulate the members of the committee, whose names are listed below; the mayor of Attleboro, Kai Shang and City Councillors Judith Robbins and Carolyn Tedino, the Reverend Theodore Lockhart, pastor of Centenary United Methodist Church, and all the other citizens of Attleboro and its neighboring communities who participated in this important event.

No one in our history has done more than Martin Luther King to advance the ideals of freedom and equal treatment of the laws which our Constitution holds out as ideals. Celebrating his work is both a tribute to his memory, and a chance for us to rededicate ourselves to seeing that these ideals—in which we have made so much progress—are in fact fully achieved. I was privileged to be able to participate in that ceremony and I ask that the program from the Dr. Martin Luther King birthday celebration program in Attleboro, MA, be printed here:

THE SAN DIEGO SEWAGE TREATMENT IMPROVEMENT ACT OF 1989

HON. JIM BATES

OF CALIFORNIA

Friday, January 20, 1989

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to assist the city of San Diego in its requirement under the Clean Water Act to achieve secondary treatment of its sewage. Since 1977, public officials at the Federal, State, and local levels have tried to grapple with San Diego's vexing sewage problems with one objective in mind, to seek the best solution for the people of San Diego. This legislation, I believe, is a step in that direction.

Today the city of San Diego is in noncompliance with section 301(i) of the Clean Water Act. This section requires the city of San Diego to treat its sewage to the secondary level by July 1, 1988. On July 27, 1988, the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) and the State of California Water Resources Control Board filed suit in U.S. District Court against the city of San Diego for violations of the Clean Water Act. The complaint against the city of San Diego is for violating State water quality standards for coliform bacteria at the city's Point Loma wastewater treatment plant.

Currently, the city of San Diego treats its sewage at the primary level at the Point Loma wastewater treatment facility before discharging the effluent into the Pacific Ocean. This facility serves the entire city of San Diego and 14 surrounding communities, or a total of 1.5 million residents. As a result, the city discharges 224 million gallons per day of primary treated sewage into the Pacific Ocean. By the year 2000, sewage treatment volume is expected to double.

According to the officials from the EPA, no other city in the State of California has as far as the city of San Diego to come into compliance with the Clean Water Act. Experts estimate that for the city of San Diego to come into compliance with the Clean Water Act, it will have to spend $1.5 to $2.4 billion. This would make it the most expensive public works project in California after the San Onofre Nuclear Power Plant.

Along with my colleagues Representative DUNCAN HUNTER and Representative TONY COELHO, I am introducing the San Diego Sewage Treament Improvement Act of 1989. The legislation earmarks a total of $10 million to complete the planning phase of the project. Initially, the city of San Diego received $10 million for planning construction of a secondary treatment works, however, an additional $10 million is needed to complete this phase of the project which is expected to be completed by early 1991.

In addition, the bill states that money earmarked for planning must be used for planning water reclamation projects for San Diego and surrounding communities. The benefits derived from reclaimed water are twofold. First, reclaimed water could be used for irrigation (both agriculture and landscape), recharge of nonpotable aquifers, industrial uses, and creation of riparian environments. Second, wastewater reclamation projects is a viable alternative to the advanced ocean dumping system currently under consideration by the Environmental Protection Agency.

The bill also requires the Environmental Protection Agency to make grants to the city for the purpose of constructing wastewater treatment works that would provide secondary wastewater treatment. The Federal share is established at 55 percent.

I am introducing this bill for several reasons. First, the cost of constructing new facilities and upgrading the existing Point Loma plant is $1.5 to $2.4 billion, all to be financed at the local level. The Federal Government, acting through the Environmental Protection Agency, will cease awarding sewage construction grants after fiscal year 1990. After fiscal year 1990, States will be required to set up a State-operated loan program. In San Diego's case, the average ratepayer bill would more than quadruple.

Second, clean water attainment is not just the city of San Diego's problem. Nationally, 188 major municipalities do not meet current Clean Water Act standards. Some communities may be spending billions or even trillions of dollars to improve their sewer infrastructures. The question that comes to mind is, "How can cities be asked to finance such high capital projects out of local revenues?"

I believe it is important for all cities to meet the standards established in the Clean Water Act. In San Diego's case, the environmental impact from dumping primary treated sewage into the Pacific Ocean has a profound affect. Secondary treatment protects the public from the disease potential of human waste and also protects fish and other aquatic life. Recent studies have revealed high bacteriological counts in the Point Loma kelp beds. High bacteria levels are harmful to divers, people who eat shellfish and, in general, degrade the marine environment.

In summary, my bill seeks to rectify a problem with a solution that other cities have enjoyed, financial assistance at the Federal level. The San Diego Sewage Treatment Improvement Act of 1988 is actually modeled after a provision in H.R. 1, the Clean Water Act, that essentially required the Federal Government to pay 75 percent for planning and construction of Boston's secondary treatment works. The bill I have introduced seeks only a 55-percent Federal share.

H.R. —

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "San Diego Sewage Treatment Improvement Act of 1989".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.

The Congress finds that—

(1) section 301(i) of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act requires that all municipal wastewater discharges achieve secondary or advanced treatment by July 1, 1988;

(2) the estimated cost of sewage treatment improvements needed for the city of San Diego, California, to meet such standards is $1,500,000,000;

(3) the Environmental Protection Agency has filed suit in the United States district court against the city of San Diego for discharging inadequately treated sewage and for violating water quality standards for coliform bacteria at the Point Loma Wastewater Treatment Plant of such city;

(4) the discharge of inadequately treated sewage is detrimental to marine life; and

(5) no other city in the State of California has as far to go as the city of San Diego in meeting the requirements of section 301(i) of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act.

SEC. 3. PLANNING.

The Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency shall make a grant of $10,000,000 from funds allotted under section 205 of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act to the State of California for fiscal year 1990 to the city of San Diego, California, for planning construction of wastewater treatment works which are necessary for providing secondary treatment for such city and surrounding communities and for planning water reclamation projects for such city and surrounding communities.

SEC. 4. CONSTRUCTION.

(a) GRANTS.—The Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency shall make grants to the city of San Diego, California, for purposes of constructing wastewater treatment works which are necessary for providing secondary treatment for such city and surrounding communities.

(b) FEDERAL SHARE.—The Federal share of projects described in subsection (a) shall not exceed 55 percent of the cost of construction thereof.

(c) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—There is authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out this section for fiscal years beginning after September 30, 1991. Such funds shall remain available until expended and shall be in addition to and not in lieu of any other amounts authorized to be appropriated under the Federal Water Pollution Control Act.

PRESIDENTIAL INAUGURAL EVENTS AT TAXPAYERS' EXPENSE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Friday, January 20, 1989

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, today we witness one of the Nation's most treasured traditions—the swearing in of the next President of the United States. These last few days have been a time of great celebration in Washington, and people across the country have shared in the excitement with us. While I am most enthusiastic about the festivities that have taken place and that will take place today, I continue to be concerned about a problem that grows worse with each inaugural, and that is the unauthorized use of taxpayer dollars for many of the inaugural activities and events.

A GAO study of the 1985 inaugural revealed that many private inaugural events "were largely planned, staffed, and executed by Federal employees at the taxpayers' expense." According to the study, the 1985 inaugural involved seven Government agencies and cost $16 million in government funds. At a time when our Nation is facing huge deficits, we need to carefully scrutinize where and how Federal moneys are being spent. It is unthinkable to ask the taxpayers, who have already borne their share in the deficit reduction process, to pay for extravagant social events that they cannot even attend.

Today I am introducing legislation to correct this situation. First, my bill will prevent taxpayer dollars from being used to pay for inaugural balls and other private social events at future Presidential inaugurals. Second, the legal authority of the Presidential Inaugural Committee has not been clear in the past. My legislation will clearly define the status and the authority of the Inaugural Committee and requires the Committee to reimburse the Government for the costs of private events. Federal spending should be restricted to the actual swearing-in ceremony, protection of the President, and other expenses that are absolutely necessary.

I first introduced this legislation with Senator Proxmire in the 100th Congress, and part of this bill was incorporated into the Defense Authorization Act, but only to be effective for fiscal year 1989. We need to take a serious look at this problem and take steps to provide some permanent solutions so that this situation will not recur at future inaugurals. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this legislation and working for its swift passage.

TENANT PROTECTION

HON. DEAN A. GALLO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 20, 1989

Mr. GALLO. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill that will provide a mechanism to protect low-income tenants from the dire consequences that follow when an owner of federally assisted housing decides to prepay his or her mortgage. This bill is more comprehensive than similar legislation that I introduced in the last Congress.

My bill amends section 8(o)(3) of the United States Housing Act of 1937 to allow low-income tenants to qualify for the housing voucher demonstration program. Further, it raises the maximum amount of income a person may have and still qualify for housing certificates under the lower income rental assistance program.

The 2-year interim plan set in place in the recently enacted Housing and Community Development Act came too late for the residents of Cherry Hill Garden Apartments and Dover Garden 1, both of which are located in my district, the 11th Congressional District of New Jersey. Further, H.R. 4 contains an interim solution while the measure I propose is a permanent solution that, with little modification, can be made part of any new mechanism designed to preserve our stock of low-cost housing.

As a result of earlier congressional attempts to provide housing for the less fortunate, in the 1960's and early 1970's, low-income families were assisted through a process that called for reducing the owner's mortgage payments and passing along to the tenants the consequent reduction in operating costs. The Department of Housing and Urban Development controlled the rents.

However, in certain instances, the agreement between the owner and the Government allowed the owner to prepay the mortgage. Having prepaid, owners are then free to raise rents to market level thereby removing the units from the supply of housing available to low-income families.

When the owner of Dover Garden and Cherry Hill prepaid, the resident low-income tenants were placed between a rock and a hard place. The demonstration voucher program, which recognizes the fact that market rate rental costs vary according to region of the country, is available only to very low-income families. The certificate program, although it includes low-income and very low-income families, does not reflect the cost of living in the 1980's in suburban New Jersey.

Although the tenants of my district are among the first in the Nation to face this crisis, there are approximately 68 New Jersey projects eligible for repayment and nationwide over 330,000 units.

Not all owners will elect to prepay their mortgages. Unfortunately, however, the most likely to take that step are those who have projects in areas in which housing costs are rising most rapidly, with the result that their existing tenants will have the most trouble relocating.

We must be concerned for these tenants who, through no fault of their own and almost without warning, face a housing crisis. The tenants are as deserving of help after the owner pays off the mortgage as before, but they now are being forced to look for a new place to live in an area that has just lost a low-cost housing unit. I believe that my bill, making housing vouchers and certificates available to existing tenants, is the most effective and workable way to provide that help.

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. LOUISE M. SLAUGHTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, January 20, 1989

Ms. SLAUGHTER of New York. Mr. Speaker, January 22, marks the anniversary of Ukrainian Independence Day. In 1918, as the First World War drew to a close, Ukrainians were able, for a few short years to determine their own national destiny. On January 22, the Ukrainian National Assembly, meeting in Kiev proudly announced the independence of Ukraine.

Unfortunately, this independence was short lived. By 1923, all Ukrainian territory was under the control of the new Soviet regime in Moscow and Ukraine was soon to be the victim of one of the worst artificially induced famines of all time. Millions of Ukrainians died during the forced collectivization of agriculture ordered by the dictator Joseph Stalin even as Ukraine exported grain to the west of the Soviet Union.

Despite the many setbacks of recent history, Ukrainians have maintained a positive outlook on the future and have striven to keep their national identity and culture alive. January 22, symbolizes that hope and buoys the spirits of Ukrainians and those who care about Ukrainians.

The history of Ukraine is a long and proud one. This commemorative date encourages all of us to remember that history and take pride in its achievements and to learn from its mistakes. Ukrainian culture is unique and its contribution to our heritage must not be forgotten.

CPC-BAY CITY: A LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS MODEL FOR THE NATION

HON. BOB TRAXLER

OF MICHIGAN

Friday, January 20, 1989

Mr. TRAXLER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to call our colleagues' attention to a major accomplishment at the Chevrolet-Pontiac-GM of Canada plant in Bay City, MI. The management team of this facility and United Auto Workers Local 362 of Bay City are to be commended for developing a most positive labor relations program.

Ten years ago, these two groups held a Quality of Work Life Program that has encouraged the talents of both hourly and management personnel in forging a well trained and well-informed work force, whose ideas and feelings are recognized and valued.

This successful endeavor paved the way for the "living agreement" signed in 1984. This landmark agreement, and outgrowth of contract negotiations that year, pledged the parties to rsesolve problems as they arise. Since then, because of an almost nonexistent grievance load, CPC has been able to focus its attention on production, high quality products, and competitiveness in the marketplace.

This process has worked exceedingly well for this plant, formerly known as Chevrolet-Bay City, to position itself as an industry leader. It has earned national recognition. More importantly, there has been a revitalization of pride in their work, a sense of ownership and responsibility for the quality of their work products, and a concern for each other's well-being. In a word, labor and management have become a real "team".

Through the use of a computer system, machines and products are monitored, and feedback is provided to the production areas so the workers know the results of their efforts and have the leeway to improve on their record. Workers have a voice in the procurement of machinery, based on the premise: Who knows the machine better than the operator? Time and time again, better ways of doing the job have been initiated through suggestions of workers on the line.

I have always felt that American workers are the best in the world, and that American industry is still the model. Anyone who doubts this need only look toward CPC-Bay City, and the leadership who had the foresight and courage to try these innovative programs.

I urge all of our colleagues to offer their strongest congratulations to Chevrolet-Pontiac-GM of Canada of Bay City, MI, its management personnel, UAW No. 362 workers, and the present plant manager, Patricia Carrigan, as they celebrate the success of their historic agreements.

PRO COMPETITION CARGO ALLOCATION ACT OF 1989

HON. JAMES L. OBERSTAR

OF MINNESOTA

Friday, January 20, 1989

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced the Pro Competition Cargo Allocation Act of 1989. This bill would repeal two of the most objectionable provisions of the 1985 farm bill's Merchant Marine Act amendments: the extra 25 percent U.S.-flag set-aside, and the Great Lakes set-aside. This would restore the historic 50-percent cargo preference requirement for humanitarian food aid such as the Food for Peace Program, and remove the Great Lakes ports' mandatory allocation of approximately 250,000 tons of food for peace, Public Law 480, title II, bagged, processed, and fortified commodities.

In the three years these provisions have been in effect, they have created only dissatisfaction and objection on the part of the Great Lakes Port Authorities.

Great Lakes port communities are intensely dissatisfied. We were highly competitive with other port ranges under the historic 50/50 cargo preference requirements. In fact, our low bids kept the lid on total program prices in all transportation modes and through all port ranges, saving tax dollars and stretching our Public Law 480 resources. Now, as the U.S.-flag set-aside has risen to 75 percent, lakes ports see their ability to compete, even to remain viable, rapidly disappearing. If our set-aside should terminate at the end of this year, as now scheduled, we may well lose even the few foreign flag lines now serving the Great Lakes/St. Lawrence Seaway System.

Other port ranges are also dissatisfied, and have complained loudly and long that the lakes' set-aside has deprived them of cargoes.

The U.S. Department of Agriculture, which has to administer the program, is not satisfied with it because the Department has had to take into account the legislated set-asides rather than allocating purely on the basis of lowest landed cost.

The U.S. taxpayers should not be satisfied because the two set-asides have already cost them $11 million in calendar year 1988 alone.

The lakes ports' set-aside cost has been modest—$2.6 million for the 1988 program year as compared to over $8 million for the U.S.-flag set-aside. Lakes ports are willing to forgo this set-aside in exchange for the right to compete on the open market for 50 percent of Public Law 480, title II bagged and processed cargoes. We believe that we can compete, and welcome the other port ranges to try to meet our costs.

Mr. Speaker, let me say that Great Lakes ports did not welcome the set-aside. Rather, we were forced into it in self-preservation.

Under the Merchant Marine Act amendments in the 1985 farm bill certain argicultural goods are exempted from cargo preference altogether. Carriage of other agricultural goods on U.S.-flag vessels, including the Food for Peace. Public Law 480 cargoes, rose from their historic 50 to 60 percent in 1986, to 70 percent in 1987, and to 75 percent in 1988.

Because Great Lakes ports have no regular U.S.-flag service, the 75 percent U.S.-flag set-aside is clearly detrimental to the lakes. The Great Lakes delegation was able to secure a brief palliative, a guaranteed set-aside of Public Law 480, title II bagged, processed, fortified commodities, through this calendar year only. After that, if the set-aside is not extended, lake ports will be able to compete with the other port ranges for—not necessarily to win—only the 25 percent non-U.S.-flag-designated cargo.

Public Law 480, title II cargoes are the lifeblood of our ports. Because their handling is labor intensive, they provide jobs for dockworkers who would otherwise be unemployed. These cargoes in addition act as magnets to our ports, drawing ships which then pick up other cargoes as well. Without title II, we could lose these vessels entirely.

Mr. Speaker, I have long supported cargo preference as necessary to a strong U.S. merchant marine. I will continue to do so. I regret having to introduce this bill, but the lakes ports' experiences under the set-aside provisions gives me no choice. The adamant refusal of U.S. lines to serve Great Lakes ports deprives the lakes not only of vessels but, under the 1985 farm bill, of cargoes, dockside employment, and associated economic benefits for ports, cities, and the region, and will mean further economic deprivation in the future unless we take this action.

I have tried to reach some accommodation with other interests on this issue, and am ready at any time to continue those discussions, particularly on ways to invite, or to create, a viable Great Lakes U.S.-flag fleet.

I also invite other port ranges, who claim they can compete with our Great Lakes ports, and who have spoken loudly against the Great Lakes set-aside, to join us on this bill.

The Pro Competition Cargo Allocation Act would help to lower the costs of shipping U.S. agricultural goods abroad, and perserve our Great Lakes ports. If it is enacted, the farmers, dockworkers, stevedores, exporters, and ports of the Great Lakes region will benefit from the more open, evenhanded opportunity to bid for Public Law 480 shipments, and the taxpayer will save money on the return to 50/50 cargo preference regardless of which ports get the allocations.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Tuesday, January 24, 1989

The House met at 12 noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D. offered the following prayer:

Gracious God, as we think of our lives and the opportunities that have been given us, may we ever remember those whose lives are burdened with strife, hunger, or pain. As some of us have been blessed with food and security, so many others lack the fundamental necessities of life, some even close to our doors. May we, O God, be good stewards of the gifts we have received and share those gifts with the needy, the poor, the lonely, through acts of love and deeds of good will. This we pray. Amen.

Member of Congress.

SWEARING IN OF THE HONORABLE CHARLES HATCHER

The SPEAKER. Will the Honorable CHARLES HATCHER, of Georgia, kindly step forward and take the oath of office.

Mr. HATCHER appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

The SPEAKER. Congratulations. The gentleman from Georgia is a Member of the U.S. House of Representatives.

WORLD CHAMPION SAN FRANCISCO 49'ERS

(Ms. PELOSI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Ms. PELOSI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today with a happy chore to bring to the attention of my colleagues the outcome of the most memorable of all Super Bowls. On Sunday night in Miami, in front of over 70,000 spectators, and millions more, half a billion more, in fact, in a television audience, the San Franciso 49'ers became the NFL's team of the 1980's. The victory was the third world championship for the team in only 8 years.

Under the flawless direction of Coach Bill Walsh and the leadership of Joe Montana, the 49'ers treated sports fans across the country to a 20-16 win, the winning touchdown, scored with only 34 seconds left on the clock, capped a 92-yard drive in 11 plays that started with 3:10 left in the game. This display of determination and teamwork exemplifies the true meaning of the word champion.

In spite of a sprained ankle, Jerry Rice set a Super Bowl record by catching 11 passes for 215 yards, and earning the title of Most Valuable Player.

I am sure my colleague, Congresswoman BOXER, who shares representation of the great city of San Francisco with me, joins me in commending the Cincinnati Bengals for their valiant effort and congratulations to them for coming to the Super Bowl, but we commend Mr. Eddie DeBartolo, Mr. Walsh, Mr. Montana, Mr. Rice, the world champion 49'ers for their outstanding team play in the NFL's ultimate game. Every member of this team put in the ultimate effort, making the final victory that much sweeter to the city of San Francisco and the team's devoted fans.

A BILL TO STUDY THE DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORTATION'S PROPOSAL TO RECLASSIFY ANHYDROUS AMMONIA

(Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I rise to urge my distinguished colleagues to cosponsor, my bill H.R. 370, mandating a study of the proposed reclassification of anhydrous ammonia under the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act.

The Department of Transportation has asked for additional comments on its unacceptable proposal to reclassify anhydrous ammonia as a poisonous gas with a deadline of March 9, 1989. But I believe it is now time to have a complete and comprehensive study on this issue as provided by my bill.

While I favor protecting the public from hazardous materials, I cannot condone the economic destruction that could occur to our farmers if these unwarranted and unnecessary regulations were established.

We now have an opportunity to present to the United States, as well as the United Nations, an economically, medically, and scientifically sound proposal with respect to transporting anhydrous ammonia. My bill's study would make this possible.

Anhydrous ammonia makes up more than 50 percent of the U.S. fertilizer supply. Reclassification threatens to boost sharply transportation and handling costs of this vital fertilizer.

Join me and the 20 cosponsors of H.R. 370 to find the facts regarding the safe transportation and use of anhydrous ammonia.

SWEARING IN OF THE HONORABLE CLAUDINE SCHNEIDER

The SPEAKER. Will the Honorable CLAUDINE SCHNEIDER of Rhode Island kindly step forward and take the oath of office.

Ms. SCHNEIDER appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

The SPEAKER. Congratulations. The gentlewoman from Rhode Island is a Member of the U.S. House of Representatives.

JOB CORPS ANNIVERSARY

(Mr. CLARKE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. Speaker, this year the Nation will celebrate the 25th anniversary of the Job Corps. The Job Corps has proved to be a remarkably effective program for training young people aged 16 to 21—most of them high school dropouts from disadvantaged families—in economically valuable skills and putting them into productive jobs in the American economy.

Eighteen of the Nation's Job Corps Centers are administered by the Department of Agriculture and twelve by the Department of the Interior on public lands. Other Job Corps Centers are operated by major corporations and nonprofit organizations under contract with the Department of Labor. Young men—and in some Centers—young women also—come for periods of up to 2 years to learn marketable skills. During this time they also have the opportunity and necessary instruction to earn their GED, the equivalent of a high school diploma. A high percentage of them earn the GED.

National business and labor organizations have participated actively in the job training program and in placing the Job Corps graduates after graduation.

A valuable byproduct of the Job Corps Program has been literally thousands of community projects performed by Corpsmen for the towns near which the Centers are located. Numerous additions and improvements to public buildings and other facilities have been made by the corpsmen.

In the 11th District of North Carolina we are fortunate to have three of the Nation's Job Corps Centers. We are proud of the work the Job Corps is doing to build the lives of young men and women and commend the corps on 25 years of very valuable service to the Nation.

OLD PAYRAISE

(Mr. PETRI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Speaker, I can see it now. Any Member of Congress who fails to work actively and honestly against the pay raise will acquire a new name.

"Congressman 'Payraise' Collier."

"Representative 'Payraise' Taylor."

"Old Payraise" is what the public will be calling our hapless colleagues back in their home districts.

Why? Well, you see, middle-income Americans who are raising families on $20,000 to $30,000 a year just can't figure out why we here in Congress supposedly need an additional $45,000 for a grand total of $135,000 in order to keep bread on the table and humble roofs over our heads.

The American people cannot figure out why so many people in Washington want to raise taxes so Congress can raise its own salaries, while asking everybody else to sacrifice.

You know what, I can't figure it out either.

But the public has figured out that this is a sneaky pay raise arrangement.

There's still time to stop this pay grab.

Schedule a vote.

Schedule a vote, Mr. Speaker.

Give us a chance to show the public that we, here in Congress, are not just here to raise our salaries and get rich.

CIVIL RIGHTS AMENDMENTS ACT OF 1989

(Mr. WEISS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, today I have the privilege of reintroducing, together with 61 of our colleagues as cosponsors legislation to prohibit discrimination on the basis of affectional or sexual orientation in public accommodations, public facilities, federally assisted opportunities, housing, and employment.

Discrimination in any form, against any class of persons, should be abhorrent to all those who live in a civilized society. Skin color, religious expression, and political belief are certainly not legitimate grounds to deny persons their full rights of citizenship. Similarly, we should not deny persons full protection under the law based on their affectional or sexual orientation. The legislation we introduce today, for the 101st Congress, is intended to assure such rights, and including the constitutionally guaranteed right to privacy.

The bill would provide no special privileges nor make any value judgment about homosexuality. It would not, in and of itself, in any way require quotas or affirmative action based on quotas.

Gay men and lesbians are in every occupation and institution in our Nation, be they doctors or nurses, lawyers or clerks, writers, union members, and managers. They are rich and poor, black and white, rural and urban, and number perhaps 20 million of the hard-working, law-abiding citizens among us.

But this minority is different from others in that they do not now have legal recourse when they encounter discrimination. This minority can still be denied housing, or employment, or public accommodation, solely on the basis of personal, private sexual orientation.

Many groups and organizations have long stood for civil rights protections for gays. These include most major unions, health, civil rights, government, church, women's, and other professional organizations. They represent what I believe is a large majority of Americans who oppose this form of bias no less than they reject discrimination directed at other minorities.

I want to again urge my colleagues to join in this effort to guarantee full and equal protection of the law to gay men and lesbians, and thank those Members, listed below, who have already signed as cosponsors for the 101st Congress.

Original cosponsors of the bill for the 101st Congress are: Mr. WAXMAN; Mr. BEILENSON; Mr. BERMAN; Mr. KASTENMEIER; Mr. SHAYS; Mr. STARK; Mr. ACKERMAN; Mr. LEWIS of Georgia; Mr. FRANK; Mr. MATSUI; Mr. LEHMAN; Mr. FAUNTROY; Mr. ROYBAL; Mrs. BOXER; Mr. SCHUMER; Mr. STUDDS; Mr. MARKEY; Ms. PELOSI; Mr. BATES; Mr. KENNEDY; Mr. MOODY; Mrs. MORELLA; Mr. FAZIO; Mr. LEVINE of California; Mr. GREEN; Mr. SABO; Mr. WHEAT; Mr. EVANS; Mr. HAYES of Illinois; Mr. UDALL; Mr. ATKINS; Mr. CLAY; Mr. DE-FAZIO; Mr. AUCOIN; Mr. COYNE; Mr. MILLER of California; Mrs. LOWEY, of New York; Mr. OWENS of New York; Mr. CROCKETT; Mrs. COLLINS; Mr. GEJDENSON; Mr. YATES; Mr. EDWARDS of California; Mr. DYMALLY; Mr. MRAZEK; Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut; Mr. MILLER of Washington; Mr. KOSTMAYER; Mr. CARDIN; Mr. RANGEL; Mr. MCDERMOTT; Mrs. SCHROEDER; Mr. FOGLIETTA; Mr. CONYERS; Mr. GARCIA; Mr. STOKES; Mr. HOYER; Mr. TOWNS; Mr. BROWN of California; Mr. MARTINEZ, and Mrs. UNSOELD.

A copy of the legislation follows:

LEGISLATION TO EXTEND HEALTH CARE FACILITIES IN RURAL AREAS

(Mr. CRAIG asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, today, Mr. VALENTINE, Mr. ROE, Mr. TALLON, Mr. SPRATT, Mr. TOM PETRI, Mr. HILER, Mr. YOUNG of Alaska, Mr. DERRICK, Mr. KOLTER, Mr. ROBINSON and I are introducing legislation of great importance to citizens of our States—and citizens across the Nation—who live in rural areas. This measure addresses a very pressing concern: the future provision of health care in rural America.

There is a sunset provision of law which must be extended immediately if this Nation's rural referral centers are to continue meeting the needs of their customers. The law allowing the reimbursement of many hospitals in rural areas at the so-called small urban rate is scheduled to sunset in October of this year.

We must act to extend this law.

In my State of Idaho and in 41 other States, rural referral centers are the cornerstones of rural health care. With the depressed financial conditions and the high rates of closure among rural hospitals, these rural referral centers are becoming more and more important. In many small cities, they are the sole source of health care.

Because rural referral centers provide a larger variety of specialized services, they are reimbursed from Medicare funds at a rate 11 percent higher than their small rural counterparts. The larger rural referral centers must also pay salaries and expenses comparable to urban hospitals.

If they are to continue offering the much needed, specialized care, rural referral centers must be reimbursed at a rate which properly reflects their costs. That is what I seek through this bill.

I hope that you and my House colleagues will see the necessity of this legislation.

CORRECTIONS TO THE MEDICARE CATASTROPHIC PROTECTION ACT OF 1988

(Mr. ANDERSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, there can be no disagreement that the Medicare Catastrophic Coverage Act of 1988 is an extremely important piece of legislation. For the first time in history, the problem of spousal impoverishment, outpatient prescription drugs, respite care, and mammography were addressed by Congress on the national level. From this ensuing debate, we were able to expand the Medicare Program to provide these benefits to Medicare beneficiaries. We were even able to focus attention and set the stage for policy initiatives for the 38 million Americans that have no health insurance at all. This was quite an accomplishment, indeed.

Then why now, after the Medicare Catastrophic Protection Act is law, are we feeling as if we betrayed America's seniors? Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, it was the rapid process by which we formed, molded, and enacted this legislation. Possibly, it was the lack of grassroots opinions we solicited during the testimonial process of the act. Or perhaps, as most seniors will argue, in our infinite wisdom, we overlooked the overriding health care problem in this country, that of cost. Not only did we overlook this problem, we compounded it. We have created an act that places addtional health care cost on those Americans least able to afford it.

Regardless of the reasons, Mr. Speaker, Congress is now being asked to do something that we don't ordinarily like to do; admit that we made a mistake. Well, I admit it, and I urge my colleagues to admit it and to work together to correct it.

There have been, and will continue to be, numerous bills introduced during the 101st Congress to remedy the problems caused by the Catastrophic Coverage Act of 1988. We owe it to our senior constituency to educate ourselves on these proposals and to support the one that will effectively correct our previous shortsightedness. After all, we can easily be forgiven for making a mistake; however, we can never be forgiven for recognizing the mistake and refusing to correct it.

DOES CONGRESS DESERVE A PAY RAISE?

(Mr. RAVENEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RAVENEL. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, those of us who have to work who say we do not want a $45,000 pay raise are lying in our teeth—for we are all human. But how many of us, in our hearts, can say that the Congress, which has made our country the greatest debtor Nation ever, deserves a pay raise? Is our fear of being honest with ourselves why we are cowardly hiding behind this shameful, gutless, pay-raise process until the clock runs out and our pockets are automatically filled? Whether or not we have a recorded vote on this issue, Mr. Speaker, is up to you and your Democratic majority. What will you Democrats do? The American people are waiting for your answer.

HOME OWNERSHIP: EQUAL OPPORTUNITY MUST BE ASSURED

(Mr. PRICE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, in the next few days, I plan to reintroduce legislation which will help make home ownership more available for many Americans. We must preserve the dream of home ownership for the next generation of Americans, and I hope we will pass legislation to expand these opportunities in the 101st Congress.

Therefore, I am very disturbed by recent reports by the Atlanta Journal-Constitution, and based on information collected by the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, indicating that savings and loan institutions reject black applicants for home loans twice as often as whites. That these disparities are not solely the result of different incomes is suggested by the finding that high-income blacks were rejected more often than low-income whites in 85 of the 100 largest U.S. metropolitan areas during at least one of the past 5 years.

I believe it is critical that Congress look into this situation, and I am certain that the chairman of the House Banking Committee, Mr. GONZALEZ, will soon hold a hearing to examine these findings more closely. If we are to continue to promote home ownership as a national goal, we must make sure that no one is denied this opportunity simply because of their race.

NATIONAL RIFLE ASSOCIATION OVERREACTS ON GUN CONTROL

(Mr. DOWNEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Speaker, it is axiomatic that the National Rifle Association has enormous influence in our country and in this institution. It is also true that they see any attempt to regulate guns as the first inexorable step toward the confiscation of all firearms.

Well, that is nonsense. Clearly, we have to have the capacity to make distinctions between assault rifles that are used to arm ourselves against our enemies and a handgun or a shotgun that can be used for hunting or target practice purposes.

□ 1220

If one has the time to talk, and look and examine this question deeply or to feel any sense of emphathy toward the children who were killed in Stockton, CA, the message must be clear to us. It is this institution, Mr. Speaker, this House, this Senate, this President, that must begin to turn back the opportunity for any person, for any reason, to have a weapon like the AK-47.

Mr. Speaker, this institution must act this year to begin the process of rationally controlling weapons of mass destruction such as the AK-47.

IN HONOR OF COL. JOHN W. ELLIS, JR.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RAHALL). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to commend one of our Nation's most dedicated military medical officers, Col. John W. Ellis, Jr., Air Force Reserve. After receiving his medical degree from Indiana University in 1960, Colonel Ellis embarked on a long career of service leading to assignment as command surgeon of the Air Force Reserve. After completion of his medical internship at Wilfred Hall Hospital, Lackland Air Force Base, TX, in 1961, and further training in aerospace medicine at Brooks Air Force Base, TX, Colonel Ellis served as a Strategic Air Command flight surgeon at Bergstrom Air Force Base, TX, until 1964. He then practiced medicine in Lubbock, TX, until 1966 when he assumed flight surgeon duties for the Federal Aviation Administration's southwestern and southern regions at Fort Worth, TX, and Atlanta, GA.

In 1968, Colonel Ellis was recalled to active duty during the Pueblo crisis with his unit, the 94th TAC Hospital at Dobbins Air Force Base, GA. Demobilized in 1969, he practiced family and occupational medicine in Atlanta from 1970 to 1983.

In January 1983, Colonel Ellis was once again recalled to active duty as a title 10, United States Code, section 265 statutory tour officer at the Pentagon in the capacity of Special Assistant for Medical Programs, Office of Air Force Reserve, Headquarters, USAF.

In August 1987, he was named command surgeon for the entire Air Force Reserve—responsible for overall program management of 12,000 Air Force medical personnel, as well as the occupational health, safety, and physical fitness of all 80,000 active Air Force Reserve personnel.

Colonel Ellis' civic and professional affiliations include the AMA, the American Academy of Family Physicians, the American Academy of Emergency Physicians, the DeKalb County, GA, Medical Society, and charter member and president of the Dunwoody, GA, Rotary Club. In addition to a career in Air Force medicine, Colonel Ellis also served as an occupational medical staff physician for the Lockheed-Georgia Co. and the Gulf Oil Co., in Atlanta. He has authorized several articles in Aerospace Medical magazine and served as contributing editor to text books on public administration.

Colonel Ellis will now retire from active military service. His leadership and dedication will be missed, but never forgotten.

Mr. Speaker, I ask to enter into the RECORD our commendation and sincere appreciation to Col. John W. Ellis, Jr., for outstanding service as a physician and citizen airman to his Nation, his community, the Congress, and the U.S. Air Force. He is the best an American can be.

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, January 22 marked the 71st anniversary of the independence of Ukraine. It was on this day in 1918 that the Ukrainian Central Rada, the Parliament of the Ukrainian people, declared independence after years of oppressive rule.

The Ukrainian National Republic, the government which the Ukrainian people formed, was one based on the rights of its citizens. It protected the rights of minorities and guaranteed certain rights for workers, including freedom of assembly. The government proudly proclaimed:

People of Ukraine! By your own power your will and your word a free Ukrainian republic now exists in your land. The ancient dream of our forefathers, who were fighters for the freedom and rights of the working people has come true * * * From this day forward, the Ukrainian National Republic is the independent, free and sovereign state of the Ukrainian people * * *.

With these words the Ukrainian people had great expectations for a new era of national renewal dedicated to the principles of justice and human dignity. Sadly, however, the reality of freedom for the Ukrainian National Republic was shortlived. By 1922, the Bolsheviks had forced their way into power, and resumed their persecutions, relocations of whole villages, exiles of Ukrainian leaders, brutal mass starvation and executions. Millions of brave Ukrainians perished during these terrible years of Stalin's rule.

These barbaric actions ushered in a long and desolate period of spiritual darkness and persecution under Communist domination which persists to this day. Although General Secretary Gorbachev has promised a new openness in the Soviet Union, the Soviets continue to make arrests and detain Ukrainian intellectuals, writers, professors, students, and scientists for alleged "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda."

The Communists have attempted to crush the culture, religion, heritage, and language of the Ukrainian people. Despite this most severe repression by the Soviets, the Ukrainians have remained steadfast in their resolve to regain their freedom and national sovereignty.

Mr. Speaker, on this 71st anniversary of Ukrainian independence, I am proud to pay tribute to the millions of Ukrainians who continue their struggle to achieve the blessings of liberty in their own homeland. I am honored to join with Americans of Ukrainian descent in the 11th Congressional District of Illinois which I represent, and all over this Nation, who pray for the independence of the Ukrainian people.

The spirit of the people of the Ukraine and the support they receive from Ukrainians all over the world is testimony to the fact that the tyranny of the Communists, no matter how brutal or oppressive, cannot conquer the soul of a nation and its people.

STATE AND LOCAL LAW ENFORCEMENT COMPENSATION ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. STARK] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, today Representatives BARBARA VUCANOVICH, NORM DICKS, BILL NELSON, and I are reintroducing a bill to provide compensation to State and local jurisdictions for extraordinary law enforcement costs resulting from demonstrations against Federal nuclear and defense activities.

Currently, State and local governments must devote their limited resources to provide necessary law enforcement services during demonstrations against Federal nuclear or defense policies. In my own district, extraordinary law enforcement services arising from demonstrations at Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory cost local agencies over $1.4 million between 1983–85.

Who should shoulder these potentially high costs? Certainly it should not fall totally on the local taxpayer who has little say in the national nuclear and defense policies which precipitate such demonstrations.

It is unfair that scarce law enforcement resources may be squandered in providing crowd control for controversial Federal facilities, while local citizens and businesses are penalized in the form of diminished police protection and programs. This is particularly difficult considering that Federal agencies are exempt from taxation which pays for local law enforcement.

Our bill, the State and Local Law Enforcement Compensation Act, is a reasonable and moderate response to this situation. It retains ordinary law enforcement services for Federal defense and nuclear agencies on an uncompensated basis, despite their tax-exempt status. Under its provisions, small demonstrations may be adequately policed without the need for Federal expenditures. Yet, it also provides an avenue for local agencies to receive just compensation for the costs of policing massive demonstrations.

Specifically, the bill requires reimbursement of reasonable and necessary costs that exceed the lesser of $50,000 or 1 percent of the law enforcement agency's annual budget. This threshold amount will keep costs to the Federal Government manageable while providing "stop loss insurance" for affected law enforcement agencies.

Critics of this bill, when it was originally introduced in the 10th Congress, labeled it an "open ended entitlement" in a time of difficult budget priorities. We think this standpoint ignores the budget constraints also faced by local agencies, particularly when confronted with unexpected, massive expenditures. Moreover, these broad criticisms overlook the real loser in these situations: The local citizens, who end up getting less protection against street crime for their tax dollar.

It is only right that the Federal Government minimize the burdens it places on State and local jurisdictions. The State and Local Law Enforcement Compensation Act does this. We hope our colleagues will support it.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

PRODUCT LIABILITY REFORM

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Energy and Commerce last year reported the Uniform Product Safety Act of 1988, the first piece of product liability reform legislation ever to be approved by a congressional committee. I was pleased to support the efforts of the Product Liability Coordination Committee with respect to this issue and look forward to working with the PLCC again in the 101st Congress.

As our committee observed in its report on the Uniform Product Safety Act of 1988:

U.S. competitiveness has been adversely affected and . . . manufacturers, product sellers, consumers, and claimants have been deprived of a fair and balanced product liability system.

Product liability reform legislation, by establishing uniform standards and rules of liability, will promote increased safety in the manufacture and use of products sold in commerce while at the same time fostering innovation and the development of new products by reducing manufacturers' uncertainty about the dangers of litigation. Despite the obvious advantages that would flow from such reform, a small but vocal minority of narrow interest groups still seeks to thwart needed change. These few, motivated by the desire for a totally risk-free society and in some cases even by profit, prey upon others' natural aversion to risk to advance their own agendas.

In an excellent article published in the January 23, 1989, issue of the New Republic, Henry Fairlie analyzes the relationship of our current product liability and tort systems to what he terms "America's morbid aversion to risk." He traces the origins of this phenomenon and examines both its seen and unseen costs. In particular, he notes:

One pernicious moral effect of America's growing fear of risk: a commensurate diminution of the notion of individual responsibility for one's actions.

While I do not necessarily subscribe to every word in the piece, I do find Mr. Fairlie's comments regarding product liability to be cogent and compelling. They should be of particular interest to Members who are concerned about our Nation's competitiveness in both the industrial and scientific spheres. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I am submitting Mr. Fairlie's article for insertion in the RECORD and urge my colleagues to give some thought to the important points he makes.

[From the New Republic, Jan. 23, 1989]

FEAR OF LIVING—AMERICA'S MORBID AVERSION TO RISK

(By Henry Fairlie)

In January 1967 the first Apollo spacecraft caught fire during a test on the launchpad. Three astronauts were killed. The nation was shocked and horrified, all the more so because the screams and scrambles of the astronauts could be clearly heard. But although there was a congressional hearing, and some delay of the manned flights, the Apollo program went smartly ahead, with the full understanding and support of the nation, and within 18 months Apollo 11 landed on the moon, ahead of the deadline set by John Kennedy. The Apollo disaster was not graven on the public mind as a rebuke to America's confidence in its technology, or taken as the occasion to preach that Americans must learn the limits to their energy and power.

Nineteen years later, the space shuttle Challenger was destroyed before our eyes on television. It was a spectacular tragedy, the result of human miscalculation and technical failure, neither of which should have been present, perhaps, but both of which are understood risks in the still dangerous enterprise of space flight. Yet the prevailing mood in America so panicked NASA that it took almost three years to send up another shuttle. NASA even reached the stage, as members of its staff said, of taking so many precautions that it was in danger of enlarging, instead of diminishing the possibility of malfunction.

In the 19 years between these tragedies, the idea that our individual lives and the nation's life can and should be risk-free has grown to be an obsession, driven far and deep into American attitudes. Indeed, the desire for a risk-free society is one of the most debilitating influences in America today, progressively enfeebling the economy with a mass of safety regulations and a widespread fear of liability rulings, and threatening to create an unbuoyant and uninventive society. As many studies show, this is strikingly an American phenomenon, one that seems to have taken root in yet another distortion of the philosophy of rights underlying the Constitution, as if the Declaration of Independence had been rewritten to include freedom from risk among the self-evident rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. This morbid aversion to risk calls into question how Americans now envision the destiny of their country.

If America's new timorousness had prevailed among the Vikings, their ships with the bold prows but frail hulls would have been declared unseaworthy. The Norsemen would have stayed home and jogged. Columbus's three tubs would not have been allowed to sail; as it was, one was left wrecked on American shores. The Vikings and Columbus were exploring what was as unknown to them then as our solar system to us today, and it is not only the practical achievements of such venturing that are frustrated by the desire for a risk-free society. Something of the questing endeavor of the human spirit is also lost. The Vikings made sagas of their explorations, as European and English literature flowered during the great Age of Exploration. There once was, but there is not now, a promise of saga in America. Its literature has retreated into a preoccupation with private anxieties and fretting.

At Three Mile Island, the fail-safe system worked. The power station switched itself off. There was a scare, but no disaster. Yet Three Mile Island in the American mind is an emblem of catastrophe. Nuclear power in America, as in no equivalent industrial or industrializing nation, has been almost paralyzed although it is the only sufficient, efficient, and relatively safe source of energy that can avoid the greater risks of pollution and the "greenhouse effect." Of course there is a risk in nuclear power, and there should be thorough inspections and safeguards. Of course, also, there is such a thing as a level of risk that is unacceptable. But in America the threshold of tolerable risk has now been set so low that the nation is refusing to pay the inevitable costs of human endeavor. Stand beneath the majesty of the Grand Coulee Dam, or gaze up at the marvel of the Brooklyn Bridge—"O Harp and Altar," as Hart Crane sang of it—and count the number of lives lost in their construction. But then feel the power, even the beauty, of both dam and bridge, and weigh the cost of lives against the benefits they have brought.

The origins of the widespread refusal to accept a sometimes high level of risk as a normal and necessary hazard of life lie in the early 1970s. As America lost heart in the prosecution of the war in Vietnam, the energy of the dissenters—the vanguard of the "Me Decade"—turned to lavish care for the environment, the snail darter, and their own exquisite, often imagined, physical and emotional well-being. The simultaneous loss of faith in American technology was part of the same phenomenon; technology, it was observed, not only fouled the environment, but had proved incapable of winning a war against guerrillas in the jungle. And beyond this, of course, has been the growth of the larger belief that science itself has somehow betrayed us, that it promises evil and not beneficence.

The loss of courage and faith has manifested itself in many ways, but it has found its most immediately dangerous expression in tort (liability) law. Tort law is not only threatening to make the economy uncompetitive, it is warping the American legal system and its judicial philosophy. As Peter W. Huber observes in The Legal Revolution and Its Consequences, "No other country in the world administers anything like it." Tort law was "set in place in the 1960s and 1970s by a new generation of lawyers and judges. . . . Some grew famous and more grew rich in selling their services to enforce the rights they themselves invented."

In November a court in Albany seriously had to consider a claim for $1 million in damages against New York state, brought by a woman who, while she was sunbathing on the beach in a public park on Long Island, was hit in the neck by a Frisbee being tossed between a nine-year-old boy and a 20-year-old woman. Her lawyer contended that the Frisbee was a "dangerous instrument" that should not have been allowed on the beach. (Since the idea of the Frisbee was taken from the bakery of that name where the workers whizzed pie plates to each other, rather than laboriously carry them, are we to assume that today the Occupational Safety and Health Administration would have stepped in to stop this skilled, efficient, rapid, but clearly "dangerous" method of conveyance?) At least this woman's claim was thrown out: the judge observed that she could have moved to another part of the beach if she feared injury from these alarming flying objects. Consider also the mother who sued a baseball club because her son was injured by a ball fouled back to their seats. It may well be that they had chosen seats there because her son had hopes of capturing a foul ball as a trophy, in which case the risk was known and invited by the mother; in any event, blame cannot be said to lie with the club, the hitter, or the ball. Here we see one pernicious moral effect of America's growing fear of risk: a commensurate diminution of the notion of individual responsibility for one's actions.

Claims of others' liability for our plights are, with the support of judges, lawyers, and juries, producing a "tort tax" on goods and services. They amount to a $300 billion levy on the American economy, observes Huber, that "accounts for 30 percent of the price of a stepladder and 95 percent of the price of childhood vaccines." The development of tort law has been particularly vicious in its effect because of another phenomenon peculiar to the United States—the award of huge punitive damages (as opposed to nominal damages, intended only to compensate the victim for the actual injury inflicted). The flagrant injustice of many of these awards was illustrated in a case brought against the Monsanto Company that sought damages for 65 plaintiffs for alleged personal injuries from one of the company's products used to make wood preservatives. After the longest-running trial in American history, the jury awarded each plaintiff one dollar in nominal damages, but then, "in a burst of tortured reasoning," as Monsanto Chairman Richard J. Mahoney says, awarded $16 million to the plaintiffs in punitive damages.

There is no justification for this. The Supreme Court has recently agreed to hear a case in which the constitutionality of huge punitive damages will be tested. In an earlier case, Justices Antonin Scalia and Sandra Day O'Connor observed that "this grant of wholly standardless discretion to determine the severity of punishment appears inconsistent with due process." Meanwhile, the awards further frustrate, if they are not crushing, the spirit of innovation in American business. The Conference Board in 1988 conducted a survey of chief executive officers. It showed that uncertainty over potential liability had led almost 50 percent to discontinue product lines, and nearly 40 percent to withhold new products, including beneficial drugs. The fault lies not only with the "wholly standardless discretion" allowed to juries to determine the severity of the punishment, but with the present power of a single jury to decide what conduct is liable for punitive damages.

The result of all this, says Justice Richard Neely of the West Virginia Supreme Court, author of The Product Liability Mess, is that "as a state court judge much of my time is devoted to ways to make business pay for everyone else's bad luck." When the step of a stepladder breaks because it was made of defective material, the payment of reasonable damages to the injured party is just. But as anyone with any household experience knows, sometimes a broken stepladder is just a broken stepladder, the result of bad luck; and surely each of us has the individual responsibility to approach any stepladder with some circumspection. The prevailing attitude in America is that people should be safeguarded against not only negligence but bad luck; it has become all too easy for lawyers to manipulate jurors who generally are scientifically ignorant and believe that they can be guaranteed a risk-free society.

One confirmation that the obsessive American aversion to risk is a growth of the last two decades is the proliferation in that time of academic and quasi-academic literature on risk, with such titles as "Public Perceptions of Acceptable Risks as Evidence of Their Cognitive, Technical, and Social Structure." The conclusions of much of this literature were drawn together in 1982 by Mary Douglas and Aaron Wildavsky in Risk and Culture, their own still impressive critique of this phenomenon. Among the interesting questions asked by the authors is "Why is asbestos poisoning now seen to be more fearsome than fire," especially when asbestos was introduced and welcomed as a prevention of injury or death by fire? The question is made even more interesting by Mahoney's revelation that Monsanto "abandoned a possible substitute product for asbestos just before commercialization, not because it was unsafe or ineffective, but because a whole generation of liability lawyers had been schooled in asbestos liability theories that could possibly be turned against the substitute." In principle, Douglas and Wildavsky note, a society selects which risks it will worry, and perhaps even legislate, about in the hope of diminishing or eliminating them. But why do Americans seem to be more concerned about the risks of pollution than about the budget deficit, economic stagnation, and even war?

Who are the people who promote the intolerance of risk in contemporary America, and select which risks the society should worry about? It is reasonable and almost certainly correct to assume a link between the attitudes that have led to the slowing of such new and promising industries as space technology and nuclear power, the gross development of liability law and litigation, the concern about environmental pollution, and the finicky attention to one's bodily health, comfort, and even purity. Together they form a syndrome. The people who are environmental extremists are likely also to be exorbitantly fussy about the risks to their bodily purity from a multiple of pollutants, natural and artificial, not much concerned about the progress of the space and nuclear power industries, automatically against manufacturing companies in liability cases, and generally uninterested in creating and maintaining a productive industrial economy.

From such people are drawn the staffs and membership of the special interest groups that have sedulously promoted America's risk aversion. Douglas and Woldavsky counted some 75 national environmental groups alone, and thousands more at state and local levels. By something like sleight of hand they represent themselves as public interest groups, but in fact these risk-averse groups speak for a very clear special interest: those who work not in manufacturing industries, but in the now vast services sector, including government and corporate bureaucracies, and who manufacture nothing. In short, they do not get their hands dirty. So it is easy for them—it does not violate their "class interest"—to be indifferent to creating a productive industrial economy. It is no sweat off their backs if a manufacturer is closed down, and its workers laid off for environmental reasons. The risk-averse groups are drawn from a privileged class.

Since it is in the interest of these groups to multiply regulations and strengthen their control of the economy, they have encouraged the growth of government bureaucracy (federal, state, and local). The federal environmental agencies have grown like a coral reef into this bureaucracy and are as indestructible. Since their bureaucrats also wish to keep their paper-shuffling jobs, they work hand in glove to promote yet more regulation of the manufacturing sector of the economy.

One of the reasons why an aversion to risk has taken hold in America is the manner in which the American political system has developed during precisely the same two decades as the growth of the movement for a risk-free society. All the influences that have been observed and analyzed—the decline of parties, the proliferation of committees and subcommittees and the undermining of seniority in Congress, and the development of the primary electoral system—have given advantage to single-issue special interest groups. Direct-mailings have provided special interest groups, as well as candidates, with direct access to the voters without having to work through the established political institutions that would have forced them to adjust their own aims to accommodate the broader national interest. Never has it been so evident that, as Macaulay wrote to his American correspondent H.S. Randall, the biographer of Jefferson, "your Constitution is all sail and no anchor." Those now filling the sails are the special interest groups, of whom the risk-averse are the most successful. European countries, in contrast, simply have not permitted the sacrifice of their political systems to the single-issue special interests. Strong parties compel these special interests to adjust to the national interests.

But these groups could not have been so destructively successful if Americans had not already suffered a loss of faith in their nation—a loss of faith in the science and technology on which American progress has been built (while paradoxically they look to science to create their version of a risk-free country); a loss of faith in America's inexhaustible possibilities, its sense of limitlessness; a loss of faith in the ever-advancing frontier, even, as Kennedy proclaimed, the exploration of the new frontier in space. And with it all, a loss of the American adventuring spirit, of the American gusto whose absence the world now laments, the gusto that, until the 1960s, blew like a fresh wind around the globe, showing what could be accomplished in so short a time by a nation that did not shrink from risk but found it a challenge.

There is something grossly at fault in the conception of the Vietnam War Memorial and the false veneration it excites. It is not, like the Iwo Jima Memorial, a monument to heroism, or even to sacrifice. It is a monument to a loss of life that is seen as wasteful and dishonorable. The feelings it excites reflect a nation that is coming to believe that even war should be fought without risk to its fighting men or risk of defeat.

A nation should lament the deaths, and succor the survivors. But it cannot forever be counting its dead.

UDAG PROGRAM SHOULD BE REAUTHORIZED

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation that would reauthorize the Urban Development Action Grant [UDAG] Program at a level of $225 million a year for fiscal years 1990 through 1993.

Mr. Speaker, since coming to Congress, I have been an outspoken supporter of both the UDAG and the Community Development Block Grant [CDBG] Programs. For the past 8 years, the Reagan administration attempted to cut back or eliminate these programs. Up until last year, Congress consistently blocked these efforts and was able to maintain funding for these programs. Unfortunately, last year in the fiscal year 1989 HUD-Independent Agencies appropriations bill, Congress provided no new funding for the UDAG Program. I believe that this was a serious error and the legislation I am introducing today is an attempt to correct this mistake.

Like many of my colleagues and like countless mayors, county supervisors, city council members, and other local officials, I recognize the central importance of the UDAG Program to local governments—especially in areas which have been devastated by economic hard times. In many instances, UDAG's provided funding for projects that otherwise would not have gone forward. The UDAG Program provided communities that are struggling economically with hope and assistance. UDAG's gave distressed communities the helping hand so vital to their economic revitalization efforts.

Mr. Speaker, the UDAG Program did work and it should not be allowed to die. Many times a UDAG will provide a community with the push it needs to get back on its feet and help itself. Most importantly, UDAG's put private money to work and they stimulate private investment in economically distressed regions.

This is an important bill Mr. Speaker, and I urge all of my colleagues to lend it their strong support. The full text of this bill is as follows:

H.R. —

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "UDAG Reauthorization Act of 1989".

SEC. 2. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR FISCAL YEARS 1990 THROUGH 1993.

The second sentence of section 119(a) of the Housing and Community Development Act of 1974 (42 U.S.C. 5318(a)) is amended to read as follows: "There is authorized to be appropriated to carry out this section $225,000,000 for each of the fiscal years 1990 through 1993.".

SEC. 3. EXTENSION OF URBAN COUNTY COMPETITION RULE.

Section 515(g)(2) of the Housing and Community Development Act of 1987 is amended by striking "October 1, 1989" and inserting "October 1, 1993".

TRIBUTE TO LEANNA BROWN

HON. JIM COURTER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in tribute to one of New Jersey's most dedicated and committed public servants for 20 years, Senator Leanna Brown.

Leanna has distinguished herself to the citizens of Morris and Passaic Counties through the 20 years of dedicated service in local and State government. Her overwhelming support from her constituency is a tribute to her unique leadership, loyalty, and dedication to the citizens of New Jersey. Her record of excellence in previous leadership positions as assemblywoman for 3 years, freeholder of Morris County and director for 8 years, and her first elected position as councilwoman in Chatham Borough have earned her the respect and admiration of all of the citizens she has represented and all those, including me, with whom she has worked.

In Trenton Leanna has been actively concerned with increasing international trade, and by being a member of the Governor's Commission on International Trade she has promoted trade offices in the Orient.

Beyond her significant achievements as a public servant, Leanna Brown has also been active in charity work, and, in particular, has been admired for her work for children. In recognition of her dedication and countless hours in her charity work and public service she has received numerous awards, including the Woman of Achievement Award from the Douglass College New Jersey State Federation of Women's Clubs, Issues & Action Award '88 Award from the New Jersey Council of Churches, and the Salute to Policy Makers Award from the Executive Women of New Jersey, to name a few.

Leanna Brown has unselfishly served New Jersey throughout her 20 years of public service and has gained a reputation among her peers and constituency for the highest integrity and abilities. The people of Morris and Passaic Counties and the State of New Jersey are indeed lucky to have such a capable and respected individual to represent their needs in the State capitol. I take great pride in noting her accomplishments to my colleagues.

JAPAN STRIKES UNFAIR DEAL WITH UNITED STATES

HON. GERALD B.H. SOLOMON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, I've always been a staunch supporter of free trade, but free trade must also be fair trade.

Once again, I regret to report, Japan has shown that it employs a double standard when it comes to its trading partners, of which America is the most important.

Our recent effort to sell Japan F–16 fighters has been instructive. A recent New York Times editorial on the subject tells the story, which I place in today's RECORD.

THE LOSING FIGHTER DEAL WITH JAPAN

An American negotiating team trying to sell F–16 fighters to Japan was defeated last month and is now in Tokyo to receive its second humiliation.

Japan wants to buy 140 new fighter planes. General Dynamics makes the world's best fighter, the F–16, in numbers that assure unmatchable economy. Furthermore, by buying American, Japan could reduce the trade surplus that so aggravates its major trading partner and help alleviate the burden America bears in defending, among other countries Japan.

Surely in this case, Japan will buy American, no? No. Japan prefers to develop the FSX, loosely patterned on the F–16, at more than twice the cost. In an agreement signed last month in Tokyo by the retiring Ambassador, Mike Mansfield, General Dynamics has been designated a subcontractor, with a promise of 35 to 45 percent of the development work. In gratitude, the company will hand over all the necessary F–16 technology.

Has the Defense Department given away the store? Its negotiators worked harder than it looks. At first the Japanese insisted on developing a wholly new fighter. The Pentagon finally induced Japan to base the plane on the F–16. New technology developed for the FSX will be made available to the U.S., for military though not commercial use.

Still, the deal is one sided and unfair. Japan shuts out American companies when it wishes to develop a new industry. Japan's insistence on developing the FSX may not relate to its effort to build up its aviation industry. Even so, the rejection of a superior American product seems familiar, and unfair.

Japan argues that defense is in a special category, and it is quite true that many countries like to build their own major weapons systems. But Japan and America have a special relationship. They are major trading partners; America shoulders the heavier part of their mutual defense, spending 6.5 percent of its gross national product on defense compared with Japan's 1 percent. The resources America diverts to defense have a lot to do with the trade imbalance that so benefits Japan.

The Defense Department, having agreed that Japan will develop most of the FSX, has now sent a team to Tokyo to plead for a share of the production contract. Agreeing to that seems the least Japan could do.

In the case of the F–16, the United States had every reason to expect that Japan would want to buy American, and every reason to be disappointed at the grudging concessions Japan has made to the two countries' common interests.

THE FILIPINO VETERANS FAIRNESS ACT

HON. NORMAN Y. MINETA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, today I reintroduced legislation to remedy the unfair situation faced by Filipino nationals who are serving in the U.S. Navy.

Under current law, Filipino servicemen are not allowed the same opportunity to apply for U.S. citizenship afforded other aliens serving in the U.S. Armed Forces. The bill, the Filipino Veterans Fairness Act, would amend the Immigration and Nationality Act to provide special immigrant status for certain aliens serving at least 4 years in our Armed Forces.

Under the terms of our military base agreement with the Republic of the Philippines, Filipinos may enlist in the U.S. Navy without first obtaining residence in this country. But many Filipinos who have enlisted in the U.S. Navy are unable to qualify for naturalization under existing law because they have not first been admitted for permanent residence in the United States. Thus, these Filipinos have no immigrant status at all.

Under U.S. law, all aliens must be admitted to this country for permanent residence before they may enlist in the U.S. Armed Forces. But upon admission for permanent residence and completion of 4 years of honorable service, U.S. law allows these aliens to be naturalized.

The legislation I have reintroduced today would provide special immigrant status for aliens serving in our Armed Forces and allow those service members to take advantage of existing law. The passage of this bill will remedy the current inequality between loyal Filipino service members and other alien enlistees.

The faithful military service of these Filipinos is symbolic of their devotion to the United States. The reenlistment rate for Filipino servicemembers is more than 90 percent. Their loyalty to the United States is documented throughout history and the need for their fair treatment is long overdue.

A TRIBUTE TO MR. IRA FREEMAN

HON. HOWARD L. BERMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to an outstanding leader of our community, Mr. Ira Freeman. On January 20, Ira concludes his term as president of the Sun Valley Area Chamber of Commerce.

Ira Freeman is a man of tremendous talent, dedication, and effort. During his tenure, the chamber of commerce has experienced great growth. He coordinated a Clean Up Program which enlisted the aid of local schools and various businesses and organizations in Sun Valley and served as the liaison between the Sun Valley Area Chamber of Commerce and the Sun Valley Residents Association, creating an on-going project for community and graffiti cleanup. Ira is also responsible for the chambers' Hispanic Business Committee to increase the level of participation by Hispanic owned businesses in chamber affairs.

Ira Freeman's contributions to the community extend beyond the chamber of commerce. His seemingly infinite energy has improved the quality of life for all who live and work in the San Fernando Valley. He is owner of Key Pharmacy and is past president of the Professional Pharmacist Society of San Fernando Valley. Ira was recognized by the University of the Pacific as recipient of the Preceptor of the Year Award for training pharmacy students. He is a founding patron of the Valley Free Clinic, a family planning facility. Ira Freeman also cosponsors San Val a valley little league team.

Ira has earned many well-deserved awards, including the 1985 State Assembly Humanitarian Award, Juvenile Justice Connection Project Man of the Year, and Small Business Person of the Year for Sun Valley, just to name a few.

It is my honor to ask my colleagues to join me in saluting Mr. Ira Freeman, an asset to our community, and a dedicated citizen.

WHAT CAN YOU DO WITH LEFTOVER FOOD?

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, with all the parties in Washington last week, much food was consumed and much food was wasted. However, thanks to Robert Egger's food transportation project, some food was redirected to hungry people.

Last Thursday, the Washington Post published a very discouraging article on area hotels refusing to donate leftover food to needy people. This triggered a published response in Friday's Post about Robert Egger, who already was working to provide assurance to hotels that they could donate food in good faith without fear of liability.

For my colleagues who may have missed the articles, they are reprinted here. To contact Robert Egger to pick up leftover food, phone 234-0707.

Congratulations to Senator DAN COATS for being the first person on the Hill to avail himself of the D.C. Central Kitchen's service.

TOSSING THE EXTRA SALAD: HOTELS REFUSE TO DONATE PARTY LEFTOVERS TO NEEDY

(By Jim Naughton)

In this week of inaugural excess, Bryna Monsein thinks her story has particular relevance.

Two weeks ago, the Bethesda resident decided to donate the leftovers from her daughter's wedding reception at the Mayflower Hotel to the Community for Creative Non-Violence. "Wonderful food," she says. "Blackened sirloin, shrimp scampi, chicken piccata, wonderful pasta."

But the Mayflower, fearing it would be liable if anyone became ill, refused.

"I was really sad," she says. "To think of all that food going into the garbage was just pitiful."

But not unusual. A number of local hotels, citing health regulations, insurance and public relations concerns, refuse to redistribute food they haven't served. Still, caterers, who would presumably have the same concerns, have earned a reputation for being generous with their clients' extra food.

"Somehow caterers have been more sensitized than hotels and restaurants," says Carol Fennelly of CCNV.

Hotel managers say it is not a question of sensitivity.

"Once food is dispensed, at no time could it be given away," says Paul J. Sacco, general manager of the Omni Shoreham Hotel. "Health laws would dictate that you would not be able to reissue it."

Sacco's opinion was echoed by other hotel managers, but, according to Sidney Hall, chief of food protection for the District's Department of Consumer and Regulatory Affairs, "There are no such regulations." Hall says hotels can donate food to charity "so long as the food is wholesome and has not been used by former patrons."

But Kevin McPhee, director of food and beverages at the Mayflower, insists that the hotel is legally liable for the food it prepares.

"It is not a question of donating food. We donate food. But donating food that has already been prepared for another purpose, that is another question," he says. "Particularly hot food. If it has to be reheated it is exposed to potential bacteria. We're very careful about these things. We have that liability."

But Fennelly says hotels are protected from liability for food "donated in good faith" by "Good Samaritan" laws in the District, Maryland and Virginia.

Still, some catering directors, like Brent Ashton at the Omni Shoreham, are wary of "loopholes in the law."

Hall says the only condition he is aware of is that food be "transported in the proper vehicle . . . Hot food must be kept hot. Cold food cold."

Fennelly characterizes the hotels' position as "baloney . . . They can do it if they choose to. A lot of restaurants use it as an excuse not to give food away."

"I think a lot of the hotels couldn't necessarily be bothered," says the Rev. John Adams of So Others May Eat, an ecumenical food agency. "It's certainly not against the law."

Bryna Monsein, who doesn't want others to repeat her experience, has sought legal recourse. Her attorney—Earl Colson of Arent, Fox, Kintner, Plotkin and Kahn—has written a letter that he hopes will serve as the basis for future agreements between hotels and relief agencies. In it, a charity acknowledges "that we have received the food in good condition," and promises "to refrigerate and otherwise keep the food in a sanitary condition suitable for consumption."

The agency agrees to release the hotel "from any claim that may arise because of your having supplied this food." And also promises to "indemnify you against any claim made by any homeless person to whom we have provided portions of this food."

"It will stand up in court" as a contract, Colson says. "Whether a hotel will say, 'Oh, that does it,' and contribute the food, I don't know."

Kevin McPhee of the Mayflower says he has seen similar documents before. "What I don't know is, if tested, would it hold?"

In lieu of a test, Monsein recommends a client investigate a hotel's donation policy before booking an event.

"My feeling is if people knew about it, they would make these arrangements in the beginning," she says. "All it involves is saying, 'Will you please?' "

LEFTOVERS FOR THE HUNGRY ROBERT EGGER'S FOOD TRANSPORTATION PROJECT

(By Jim Naughton)

If you've begun to wonder what a point of light looks like, meet Robert Egger.

Last year the 30-year-old District resident quit his job as a restaurant manager to help feed the city's hungry. This morning he'll inaugurate the D.C. Central Kitchen, an organization dedicated to transporting leftover food from hotels and restaurants to shelters and soup kitchens.

Egger, who worked in area restaurants for 10 years, says he undertook the project because restaurateurs and hoteliers threw away huge quantities of food, believing there were no sanitary, legally authorized procedures for donating it.

To overcome their reluctance, Egger, an experienced food handler, bought a van outfitted with a large new refrigerator and is drawing up a contract to absolve donors from liability for illnesses caused by any food donated "in good faith."

The initial response has been encouraging. Joe & Mo's, Tila's, Movable Feast catering and the American Foreign Service Club are among the businesses that have signed a letter of support. The Washington Restaurant and Beverage Association is profiling the Kitchen in its upcoming newsletter, and Leonard Hickman, executive vice president of the Washington Hotel Association, says he plans to call Egger and "see what we can do."

Egger, who will make his first pickups this morning at Holiday Inns in Georgetown and Arlington, is certain that the Kitchen will succeed. His chief worry is that it will succeed too well, too soon.

"I think we are going to be bombarded," he says with a mixture of delight and trepidation. "With all the parties in this town. All the corporate cafeterias. All the banquets. I'm already concerned that we are going to need another van."

The seed for the Kitchen was planted four years ago when Egger and his wife Claudia began working with hunger relief efforts sponsored by Grace Episcopal Church and the Salvation Army.

"We always tried to avoid having to go out on the food delivery truck," he says. "But then when we finally did . . . I know it sounds corny, but it really did change our lives dramatically."

While Egger, who'd managed the Childe Harold and Clyde's in Georgetown, threw himself into raising the $50,000 it took to open and insure the Kitchen, Claudia, executive assistant to a local attorney, supported the couple. The pieces fell into place early this month, and Egger, now working on a small salary, seized on Inauguration Week, with its myriad banquets and receptions, as a propitious time to start.

The Kitchen is currently a have-truck-will-travel operation, but in April, Egger and Jack White, executive director of the Coalition for the Homeless, plan to open a newly renovated industrial-sized kitchen on Florida Avenue NW where crudité plates can be converted into salads and stews.

White made the kitchen available after meeting Egger last year. "He walked in my door one day and said, 'I have an idea,' " White recalls, "It just so happened that his idea met my need. We have what I would describe as an inadequate food program. We're always lacking salad, fresh fruit, the very stuff he's likely to get the most of."

Egger also plans to offer an eight-week food preparation program taught by volunteer chefs who will train homeless people who apply through the coalition.

"In other words it's the homeless preparing food for the homeless," Egger says. "I think we could train some good-caliber entry-level people, even assistant-chef-level people."

"That's what will distinguish what he's doing from other programs," says Rick Stack, a founder and former director of the Capitol Area Community Food Bank.

Stack, who sits on the Kitchen's board of directors, helped Egger research similar programs last year in New York, Philadelphia and Atlanta.

"What the restaurants did in Atlanta to assuage their concern about liability is they would intentionally produce more than they could sell and give that surplus to Atlanta's Table," Stack says. "I know that's what Robert is hoping will happen in the local hospitality industry."

WOMEN'S AND MEN'S CAUCUSES FETES VICTOR R. RODRIGUEZ

HON. EDOLPHUS TOWNS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. TOWNS. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, September 24, 1988, the Women's and Men's Caucuses for Congressman EDOLPHUS "ED" TOWNS held their Annual Dinner Dance at the Fleur De Lis Restaurant. As part of this annual event, the Caucuses honored Victor R. Rodriguez.

Victor Rodriguez, though born in Puerto Rico, was raised in the Brownsville and East New York sections of Brooklyn, in a family of four brothers and seven sisters. After attending the Brooklyn public schools, he enlisted in the U.S. Marine Corps, where he served in the Vietnam war receiving several medals for gallantry and two purple hearts. Following his return to the States, Victor was assigned M.P. duty at the Pentagon in Washington, DC, until his discharge in July 1970.

Mr. Rodriguez enrolled at Brooklyn College in 1971, graduating 6 years later with a B.S. in physical education. He immediately became a teacher at Thomas Jefferson High School, teaching classes to to non-English speaking students. While at Thomas Jefferson, he also coached both the junior varsity and varsity football teams for 10 years.

In 1977, Victor re-enrolled in the masters program at Long Island University, receiving his M.S. in bilingual education in June 1979. Continuing his education, Mr. Rodriguez enrolled at Long Island University again; this time in pursuit of a professional diploma in supervision and administration, which he received in August 1981.

In March 1982, Victor became assistant principal at I.S. 171, in which capacity he served for 5 years. In April 1987, he became principal of P.S. 159. For Victor, being a principal has been the ultimate challenge. He says that "seeing young minds blossom and youngsters grow is a joy. It is a joy because we are molding the minds and bodies of the future. A future filled with high hopes and attainable dreams."

Victor is living proof of that. I extend my sincerest congratulations to Victor on his many accomplishments, and my best wishes for a successful and fulfilling future.

INTRODUCTION OF STUDENT LOAN LEGISLATION

HON. TIMOTHY J. PENNY

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. PENNY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce legislation to restore the ability of postsecondary schools to make federally guaranteed loans to their students.

By way of background, in 1986, a provision was included in the reauthorization of the Higher Education Act of 1965 to allow postsecondary schools to act as lenders in the Federal student loan programs. Many members of the Education and Labor Committee at that time felt, as I did, that such a change would expand the number of likely lenders for students to choose from when applying for guaranteed loans, would generate income to allow schools to expand institutional-based aid or nonguaranteed loans to students, and would assist in the reduction of defaults on federally backed student loans.

During the debate on the higher education technical amendments last Congress, critics charged that under the 1986 provision schools would make loans and immediately turn them over to secondary loan markets and therefore would not develop a long-term commitment to a lending program. This concern led to a repeal of the 1986 provisions. This legislation addresses that concern by stipulating that institutions who make loans to their students will be required to hold those loans until the beginning of the grace period of the loan. This requirement will insure that schools do not routinely make loans and immediately sell them to other lenders in the secondary loan market.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation is really very simple: it grants schools the opportunity to make loans to their students that banks and other lenders have long enjoyed. Last Congress, over 30 Members were cosponsors, and several educational organizations, including the American Council on Education, and the National Association of Student Financial Aid Administrators, endorsed this legislation.

When we are searching for ways to increase the amount of aid available to students and examining proposals to reduce the growing student loan default problem, let me suggest, Mr. Speaker and colleagues, that this legislation is an important start in addressing both policy concerns.

The bill follows:

H.R. —

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 435(d)(2) of the Higher Education Act of 1965 is amended—

(1) by inserting "and" at the end of subparagraph (B); and

(2) by striking out everything after subparagraph (B) and inserting the following:

"(C) shall not, as a regular practice, sell or assign the loans made under this part to any other eligible lender except after the borrower ceases to carry at least one-half the normal full-time academic workload (as determined by the institution).".

A BILL TO LIMIT SOUTH AFRICAN INFLUENCE AND CONTROL OF UNITED STATES BUSINESS ENTERPRISES

HON. MICKEY LELAND

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, when Congress passed the Comprehensive Anti-Apartheid Act of 1986, it sought to make apartheid economically and morally untenable by prohibiting certain United States investments in South Africa.

Unfortunately as of 1985, United States affiliates of South African companies hold an estimated $84 billion in total assets. Furthermore, South Africa continues to increase its stake in key American industries. For example, Minorco, a South African controlled company, is making a hostile bid for Consolidated Gold Fields—a British concern with strategic mineral assets in the United States. A successful acquisition would give South Africa a greater hold on the international mining industry. Because the use of apartheid-generated profits in such a manner provides economic and social stability for South Africa and fuels apartheid, it should be eliminated.

Today, I am introducing a bill to close this loophole in the Anti-Apartheid Act. Quite simply, this bill prohibits South African business enterprises, persons or governments from acquiring, purchasing or owning 5 percent or more of voting securities of any United States business enterprise. While South African persons can continue to invest minimally in the United States they will not be able to exert control over U.S. corporations.

Our past actions suggest that Americans find apartheid so morally abhorrent that we chose not to associate with such a racist system. If we are to be philosophically consistent, if we are to maintain a congruent policy, and if we seek to send a clear message to South Africa, we must end South African investment in the United States. To permit this practice to continue would be hyprocritical.

I urge you to support this bill and help end the tragedy that is apartheid.

H.R. —

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. MEASURES TO LIMIT THE INFLUENCE AND CONTROL OF SOUTH AFRICANS IN UNITED STATES BUSINESS ENTERPRISES.

(a) No South African person may directly or indirectly acquire, purchase, own, or hold 5 percent or more of the voting securities of any business enterprise incorporated, chartered, or organized in the United States.

(b) For purposes of this Act the following terms have the following meanings:

(1) The term "South African person" means—

(A) any person resident in South Africa or subject to the jurisdiction of South Africa;

(B) any individual, branch, partnership, associated group, association, trust, estate, corporation, or other organization organized under the laws of South Africa, and the Government of South Africa (including a State or local government, and any agency, corporation, financial institution, or other entity or instrumentality thereof, including a government-sponsored agency); or

(C) any entity of which 5 percent or more of its voting securities is directly or indirectly owned or controlled by any person or entity under subparagraphs (A) and (B).

(2) The term "business enterprise" means any organization, association, branch, or venture which exists for profitmaking purposes or to otherwise secure economic advantage, and any ownership of any real estate.

(3) The term "associated group" means two or more persons who, by the appearance of their actions, by agreement, or by an understanding, exercise their voting privileges in a concerted manner to influence the management of a business enterprise. Each of the following are deemed to be an associated group:

(A) Members of the same family,

(B) A business enterprise and one or more of the officers and directors.

(C) Members of a syndicate or joint venture.

(D) A corporation and its domestic subsidiaries.

(c) For purposes of this Act in determining any percentage of the voting securities, the voting securities shall be deemed to consist of the amount of the outstanding voting securities, exclusive of any voting securities held by or for the account of the issuer or a subsidiary of the issuer.

(d) A South African person in violation of subsection (a) shall divest ownership of such voting securities as are in violation of the limitation under such subsection within one year after the date of the enactment of this Act.

(e) The United States or any person aggrieved may bring a civil action in an appropriate district court for equitable relief with respect to any violation of this Act. If a plaintiff other than the United States is a prevailing party in such an action, the court shall award costs and reasonable attorney fees to that plaintiff. For purposes of this subsection a "person aggrieved" shall include any shareholder, officer, employee, or employee representative (including designated collective bargaining agent) of a company whose voting securities are acquired, purchased, owned, or held (either directly or indirectly) in violation of this Act.

BLACK COLLEGES GET A BOOST

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to share with my colleagues the following article from the St. Louis Limelight. In it, Tony Brown brings attention to the growing consciousness and responsibility among the black community toward higher education. I found this article encouraging, because it illustrates how our contributions enable our children to achieve at black colleges and universities, and to overcome the barriers to social and economic equality.

[From the St. Louis Limelight, December 1988]

COSBY'S DONATE $20 MILLION

(By Tony Brown)

Bill Cosby and Camille Cosby gave $10 million each to Spelman College and demonstrated that the only color of freedom is green. They also reminded the world that the freedom of Black people is the responsibility of Black people.

While not having millions of dollars, thousands of Blacks who graduated from White colleges are making the same point another way. In a desperate attempt to find one another and survive in hostile settings, they are intensely involved in "networking"—a modern term for "extended family."

Black college students, who ten years ago would not have visited a Black college campus, are now stampeding Fisk (enrollment up 19%); Florida A and M (up 15%); South Carolina State (up 9%); Jackson State (up 12%); and Alabama State (up 14%).

Norfolk State University most outstanding science programs in the country with a guaranteed education, has grown to an all-time student enrollment of 8,000. And if you want to get into Hampton University, start applying a few years early.

What's happening? It's not what Newsweek magazine and the majority of the White Press is reporting. Whenever they report on Black colleges or other self-help projects, they select the worst-case scenario.

That's why Black people must listen to a different drummer.

Woodie King, Jr., director of the Broadway play "Checkmates," is doing just that. The White critics knocked Ron Milner's writing, King's directing and the overall production, but Black audiences love it. As a result, a potential flop has turned into a hit.

The 100 Black Men of Atlanta raised $60,000 in a fundraiser with "The White Girl," my movie that will hit the theaters in June, 1989.

"Atlanta Students Give Anti-Drug Movie Rave Reviews" read the headline in The Atlanta Journal and Constitution. "They applauded during the anti-drug statements, boogied in their seats during the dance scenes and cheered when the dope dealer got his due," the Journal said.

"Hey, it was real. The movie told me not to use drugs, and then showed me why," said Marquis Smith, 14, a ninth-grader at Fulton Senior High.

The Journal also explained that "the $60,000 in proceeds from the Atlanta showing will go to the civic club's 'Project Success' program. Under the nine-year endeavor, 31 Archer High School students have been adopted by members and will receive full tuition to an accredited college of their choice upon graduation."

"This fundraiser premiere of 'The White Girl' is a unique way of raising money for our scholarship program and getting the anti-drug message out to young people," said John Grant of The Atlanta Black Men.

"Those on hand gave the movie and message a rousing thumbs up," wrote Keith Thomas in The Atlanta Journal.

Meharry Medical College sold 2,000 tickets ($50 and $100) for its sold out premiere in Nashville. St. Catherine Church (AME Zion) in New Rochelle, N.Y.; the Black-owned Norfolk Community Hospital and Norfolk State University; and the Black MBAs and Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity of Dallas are other groups that have held recent fundraisers in this newly-discovered atmosphere of self help.

We will continue to make the movie available to our community until June of 1989 (Info: 212/575-0876).

There is a new spirit of self-help born out of a new reality that White people and White institutions are not going to free Black people.

Not many, perhaps no one else, can do what Bill and Camille Cosby did, but we can all give something—no matter how small—to a Black charity.

"Thumbs Up" to all who try.

RENTAL REAL ESTATE RELIEF

HON. J.J. PICKLE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing legislation to modify the passive loss rules enacted as a part of the Tax Reform Act of 1986 and to restore a significant measure of fairness and justice to owners of rental real estate. This bill would reinstate a general tax deduction for cash losses by rental real estate owners. Such a limited deduction would ease the burden sustained by active real estate owners in tough economic times and at the same time maintain one of the principal goals of the 1986 Tax Reform Act of eliminating tax shelters. I introduced this measure during the 100th Congress, and in my judgment the need for this revision is greater than ever.

The passive loss section was a cornerstone of the antitax shelter provisions of the 1986 Tax Reform Act. Generally, I believe these rules are accomplishing their goals. However, the rules go beyond eliminating real estate tax shelters. Unfortunately, their sweeping nature not only stops individuals from deducting paper losses—such as depreciation expenses—but also prevents taxpayers from claiming current business deductions for the cash expenses associated with owning and maintaining rental real estate properties. In other words, the passive loss rules will only allow the real estate owner to defer the deductibility of a loss even if the loss is a true economic or out-of-pocket cash expense.

The bill I am introducing today would allow owners of rental real estate to claim a current tax deduction for only that portion of the owner's cash out-of-pocket expenses—such as utility, insurance, and repair expenses, State and local property taxes, and interest payments—which exceed rental income from the property. Only those rental property owners who actively or materially participate in the ownership and management of the property would qualify for the deduction. Passive investors in the property would be excluded and paper losses would continue to be deferred for all rental property owners.

The inability to deduct out-of-pocket cash expenses presents a significant problem to owners of rental real estate, particularly to those owners in areas, such as my district of Austin, TX, undergoing economic difficulties. Many of these owners find themselves in an economic situation where the current rental income from the property is less than the legitimate, ongoing expenses of owning and operating the property. This creates a "negative cash flow" situation. For example, there may be an unforeseen lag between tenants, rent control ordinances, an unusually high vacancy rate which keeps rental income down, or nonpayment of rent. Additionally, operating expenses may be unusually high because of escalating insurance premiums, adjustments to tax assessments, costs of responding to vandalism and zoning restrictions, and common expenses incurred to repair or renovate an otherwise unmarketable property.

What these taxpayers must do during these unfortunate periods is fund the difference between the rental income they receive and the expenses of maintaining the property, with cash out of their pocket. This negative cash flow, up until the 1986 Tax Reform Act, was fully and immediately deductible by the taxpayer/owner as an expense incurred for the production of income.

My constituents have informed me that the real-world effects of the inability to deduct cash losses are that rental housing properties in economically weakened real estate markets are abandoned. Owners are now discouraged from undertaking the risks associated with redevelopment and rehabilitation of existing projects, rents are increased on those properties with tenants, and because abandonments and foreclosures are more possible, the loan portfolios of the Nation's already deeply troubled financial institutions are further weakened.

Mr. Speaker, during the conference of the 1986 Tax Reform Act, when the House conferees were presented with passive loss rules by the Senate, I attempted to rectify the provision to allow true cash losses sustained by nonpassive owners to be immediately deductible. In conference, I argued that this particular section of the bill was too harsh and needed to be corrected. Unfortunately, the decision was made to enact the passive loss rules, as is, and correct the consequences later.

Mr. Speaker, no matter how much I would like to introduce this legislation with a retroactive effective date, believing that troubled rental real estate owners are deserving of such relief, I am obliged to recognize that budgetary constraints will only permit that the bill be prospective in nature. The legislation is therefore effective beginning the first tax year following the date of enactment.

I believe now is the time to address this principal shortcoming in the 1986 tax changes affecting rental real estate. Importantly, my bill would help sustain active property owners with high cash losses who would otherwise have little recourse but to submit to foreclosure proceedings. Without the ability to deduct cash losses, these people have little incentive to hold on to troubled properties. Besides its immediate help to economically-distressed individuals in the real estate business, my bill will help ease the growth of foreclosed properties and consequently reduce the overwhelming strain on resources of our financial institutions.

Mr. Speaker, I call on my colleagues to join me in a genuine opportunity to help remedy the major problems the passive loss rules have created for real estate owners and investors.

LEGISLATION TO REAUTHORIZE HUD HOUSING COUNSELING PROGRAM

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to reauthorize a housing counseling program that was enacted into law in the last Congress. Last fall, the House-Senate conference report on H.R. 4800, the fiscal year 1989 HUD-Independent Agencies appropriations bill instructed the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development to use some of the $3.5 million appropriated in the bill for HUD housing counseling programs to implement a new counseling program I had authorized in the Housing the Community Development Act of 1987, Public Law 100-242.

The legislation I am introducing today would reauthorize this new program at a level of $10 million a year for fiscal years 1990 and 1991. Under this program, HUD is authorized to make grants to nonprofit housing counseling organizations. These grants can be used to provide counseling to all homeowners—even those with conventional loans. Previously, HUD counseling programs only covered FHA and other HUD-backed loans. Eligibility for assistance would be limited to those homeowners with good credit and work histories who have been unable to made mortgage payments due to conditions beyond their control.

As enacted into law last year, my legislation would require that lenders, in sending out delinquency notices, also include information on where the homeowner can go to get counseling from HUD-approved counseling agencies. HUD must establish a toll-free number homeowners can call to get information on HUD-approved counseling assistance. HUD will also have to take action to ensure that housing counseling services are available throughout the country—especially in areas with high foreclosure rates.

Mr. Speaker, the approval of this bill and the subsequent appropriation of funds will allow this vital program to continue to assist homeowners. Housing counseling agencies have a proven record of helping homeowners avoid foreclosures. By assisting struggling families to keep their homes, housing counseling agencies help to keep the American dream of home ownership alive. By preventing foreclosures, these agencies also save the Federal Government millions of dollars every year. Federal money spent on housing counseling programs is a wise investment of the taxpayers' hard earned money and will, in the long run, help to reduce the deficit.

I urge all Members to enthusiastically support this important legislation.

H.R. —

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Homeownership Counseling Reauthorization Act of 1989".

SEC. 2. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR FISCAL YEARS 1990 AND 1991.

The first sentence of section 106(c)(8) of the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1968 (12 U.S.C. 1701x(c)(8)) is amended to read as follows: "There is authorized to be appropriated to carry out this section $10,000,000 for each of the fiscal years 1990 and 1991.".

SEC. 3. EXTENSION OF PROGRAM.

Section 106(c)(9) of the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1968 (12 U.S.C. 1701x(c)(9)) is amended by striking "September 30, 1989" and inserting "September 30, 1991".

FLIGHT ATTENDANTS DUTY TIME

HON. NORMAN Y. MINETA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to deal with the apparent and continuing inability of the Federal Aviation Administration and the Department of Transportation to establish rules prohibiting excessive duty hours for airline flight attendants.

Petitions for rulemaking urging FAA and DOT to deal with this problem were filed close to 4 years ago. On November 1, 1985, I and my colleagues, Congressmen Howard, OBERSTAR, LEHMAN, and EDWARDS, and Congresswoman SCHROEDER, wrote to the FAA Administrator urging him to initiate a rulemaking proceeding. No action was taken in response to our letter.

I wrote again in April 1988 renewing our request. On June 13, 1988, I received an answer from Administrator McArtor stating that over the past 2 years the FAA had conducted a thorough analysis of the pending petitions; that this rulemaking continued to have priority for the agency, although over the past 2 years other projects had been given higher priority due to their urgency or a mandate by Congress; and that a decision on whether to go forward with a rule will be made shortly.

Yet despite this promise of a decision by the FAA, none was forthcoming last year. This led me to introduce a bill on September 27, 1988, and to hopefully prompt the Department of Transportation and the Federal Aviation Administration into action.

Now, 3 months later, in the new Congress, with no decision having been made to date, I again find it necessary to deal with the problem by legislation.

Since there is no question that excessive fatigue can interfere with the performance of responsibilities affecting aviation safety, the Federal Aviation Administration has imposed limitations on work hours for airline pilots, flight engineers, flight navigators, mechanics, dispatchers, and air traffic control tower operators. I see no reason why the rationale for these limitations does not require adopting regulations to ensure that flight attendants are adequately rested so that they will be able to perform their important safety functions proficiently.

Flight attendants have important safety responsibilities in dealing with such problems as rapid depressurization, cabin fires, passenger illness or injuries, hijackings, and situations requiring evacuation of an aircraft. Flight attendants are also responsible for taking routine measures to ensure that an aircraft cabin is safe, ensuring that doors are closed, that baggage is safely stowed, and so forth. Attendants are also responsible for detecting conditions during a flight which may indicate a safety problem. I do not think that it can be seriously argued that excessive fatigue would not interfere with a flight attendant's ability to carry out these responsibilities.

Some collective bargaining agreements may include limitations on duty hours which adequately protect against fatigue. However, not all attendants are covered by union contracts.

The matter of excessive duty hours is not a theoretical problem. FAA has advised us that they are aware of cases in which flight attendants have been required to work for as long as 24 consecutive hours. In the accident involving Galaxy Airlines in Reno, NV in 1985, the NTSB investigation disclosed that at the time of the accident, two flight attendants had been on duty for over 18 hours and were scheduled to continue on duty for an additional 7 hours.

My personal preference, and the approach which has generally been followed by the Aviation Subcommittee in dealing with safety problems, is to have the necessary regulations developed by the Federal Aviation Administration rather than the Congress. FAA has the staff resources, the expertise, and the established procedures to gather the necessary information and develop regulations on complex technical problems. The legislation I have introduced is consistent with this approach. The legislation directs DOT and FAA to issue a notice of proposed rulemaking on flight attendant duty time by 60 days after date of enactment and to issue final rules 180 days later.

However, in the event FAA fails to carry out these statutory directives, the legislation imposes regulations establishing duty hour limitations for flight attendants. The regulations would limit flight attendant duty time to a maximum of 14 to 20 hours, depending on the type of flight and require prescribed periods of rest after each duty period. For any flight scheduled for 8 or more hours of flight time, the attendants must be given a rest break of at least 1 hour during the flight. The legislation also requires that flight attendants must be given a minimum of eight periods of rest of 24 consecutive hours at their domicile each calendar month, and at least one period of rest of 24 consecutive hours every 7 days.

I believe that these requirements are reasonable and will prevent excessive duty periods, while giving the airlines flexibility to use their work force efficiently. I recognize that this is a highly technical and complex area and I would welcome suggestions on how these regulations could be improved. As I have indicated, my preference would be for the Congress to not get into the business of adopting the regulations at all, but for the Federal Aviation Administration and the Department of Transportation in the Bush administration to carry out their responsibilities to protect aviation safety by issuing regulations prohibiting excessive duty hours for airline flight attendants. The safety of airline passengers requires nothing less.

A TRIBUTE TO EMEK HEBREW ACADEMY

HON. HOWARD L. BERMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize the work of a fine educational institution in my community, Emek Hebrew Academy, a citadel of Jewish education. On January 8, 1989, Emek Hebrew Academy celebrated 29 years of outstanding academic achievement.

Emek Hebrew Academy was established to instill, preserve, and teach traditional Orthodox Jewish values. With a current enrollment of 530 students from grades nursery through eighth, Emek is the largest Orthodox Hebrew Day School in the San Fernando Valley. The academy has an excellent reputation in the academic arena and has been a role model for similar institutions of learning. Under the leadership of Rabbi Yochanan Stepen, Rabbi Philip Wachsman, Mrs. Evelyn Sass, and Rabbi Eliezer Eidlit, Emek is fast becoming a center for intensive Jewish adult education and community outreach programs and continues to play a major role in offering the entire San Fernando Valley Jewish community innovative educational programs and vital community services.

It is a pleasure to ask my colleagues to join me in saluting the Emek Hebrew Academy. The academy has an impressive record of being dedicated to the preservation of Jewish culture, heritage, and tradition. It is an honor to have such a fine educational institution in the 26th District.

EDEN EXPRESS—GREAT SUCCESS

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, please join me in honoring one of the most noteworthy causes and innovative businesses in my district. The Eden Express is a model for disabled worker training that should be noted and emulated nationwide.

The Eden Express is an 82 seat restaurant located in Hayward, CA. Founded in 1980 by Sheila Martinsen and Celia Bjerkan, the restaurant is headquarters for a groundbreaking project in which disabled workers (with disabilities such as manic depression, deafness, schizophrenia, and learning impairments) are trained to live in the mainstream and hold steady jobs.

So far the program has turned out more than 400 graduates, 90 percent of whom have moved on to paying jobs. But the Express's most significant achievement has more to do with giving its employee-students a sense of confidence in dealing with some of life's most demanding and necessary responsibilities. The employee-students of this restaurant are learning the intricacies of proper social interaction, grooming, personal budgeting, math, reading, and perhaps most importantly, adjusting to the stress frequently encountered in everyday life.

Through this program, director of training Barbara Cymrot gives the employees a chance to shake the wrenching sense of failure that can often plague the disabled. Meanwhile, with time and careful promotion, executive director Barbara Lawson has established the Eden Express as a pleasant retreat with competitive standard of service and cooking.

Once again I would like to express my gratitude and congratulations to the contributors, owners, and managers of Eden Express, the employers who have put Express graduates to work, and the worker-students who through perseverance, are striving to make life a more pleasurable and satisfying experience.

People magazine of October 10, 1988, contained an excellent description of the Eden Express story, which I would like to reprint at this point in the RECORD. The only thing the article did not bring out clearly enough is that it is a very good restaurant and the food is excellent!

THE EDEN EXPRESS, A RESTAURANT WITH A MISSION AS WELL AS A MENU, TEACHES THE DISABLED TO FEND FOR THEMSELVES

(By Michelle Green, with Michael Alexander)

It is early morning, and the Eden Express seems much like any other unpretentious little eating house in the blue-collar town of Hayward, Calif. The 82-seat restaurant buzzes with the chatter of the breakfast crowd as the youthful, well-scrubbed staff moves about among the butcher-block tables. The newcomers take a seat by the window, and Sean, a heavyset waiter in a striped apron, ambles over to hand them their menus. "Thank you," they say. "You're welcome," he replies, and he means it.

Returning to take the order, Sean pulls a notepad from his pocket, squints at the page and laboriously writes E-G-G-S. But the second customer wants something more complicated. "I'd like the eggs scrambled on the muffin," he says, "not poached, and I want them dry." A look of mild panic flashes in Sean's blue eyes. A subtle kick under the table, from his companion, prompts the diner to simplify his request. He asks for toast instead, and Sean breathes a little inward sigh of relief.

As the tabletop placards explain, the Eden Express is unlike any other restaurant in America. Sean, 20, is learning-disabled, and his co-workers are afflicted with manic depression, deafness, schizophrenia and other disabilities. Founded in 1980, the restaurant is headquarters for a groundbreaking project in which students like Sean are trained to live in the mainstream and rescued from a life of hopelessness. "We give these kids a chance to start dreaming again, to start believing they have a chance to make it out there," says director Barbara Lawson. "The majority of them had given up on themselves."

Celebrating its eighth anniversary this week, the program has turned out more than 400 graduates, 90 percent of whom have moved on to paying jobs. But the Express's most significant achievement has more to do with pride than with paychecks. In afterwork seminars and counseling sessions, Sean and his classmates are learning the intricacies of proper social interaction, grooming, personal budgeting, math and reading—all of the skills they will need in the marketplace. Armed with new confidence, they will have a chance to shake the wrenching sense of failure that often plagues the disabled. "My kids are really proud of me," reports Denise, a 33-year-old learning- and hearing-impaired graduate who passed through Eden's gate and now works as a baker's assistant at Safeway. A single mother of two, she had never held a regular job before she was hired by the supermarket chain in July. "When I got my first paycheck, I was real excited—I went and framed it," she says. "Now my dream is to move from where I'm living into a nicer neighborhood."

Not surprisingly, the program has the enthusiastic support of the mental-health community. Wrote psychiatrist and author Dr. Maryellen Walsh in her 1985 book Schizophrenia: "To call Eden Express another rehab project is to call Paris another town, Picasso another artist, and Dietrich just another pretty face."

The Eden Express was conceived by activists with more vision than capital. In 1978 Sheila Martinsen and Celia Bjerkan, both mothers of children who suffered from mental illness, heard about a restaurant in San Rafael that had once served as a workshop for the mentally disabled. Determined to create similar opportunities for children like their own, the two women seized on the idea and scoured Hayward for financial support. Christ Presbyterian Church put up $25,000, and 300 volunteers helped transform a rundown pizza parlor into the tidy Eden Express. (The name is taken from a book by Mark Vonnegut, son of Kurt, about his battle with schizophrenia.) Keeping the project afloat, however, was another matter; within seven months, the Express was $30,000 in debt and one month from bankruptcy.

When Lawson, 51, a social psychologist, heard in April 1981 that the Eden Express needed an executive director, she was only mildly interested. "I said, 'Oh, I'll just look at it. But there's no way I'll deal with it,' " she remembers. "It was already in the hole." Then the project caught her fancy. "I saw that I could train people," she says, "and put them in the marketplace where they were needed."

A vibrant extrovert with a master's degree in public administration, Lawson, a mother of three, seemed just right for the job. She had not only spent much of her life working with the handicapped, but she knew the restaurant business as well. She and her second husband had once owned an ice-cream parlor in Lafayette, Calif. Lawson also brought to the job a profound understanding of the destructive force of mental disability: Her 27-year-old daughter, Lori, is severely retarded and had been institutionalized since the age of 14. Divorced from Lori's father and struggling through the end of her second marriage, Lawson had fought to keep her own life going while she tried to get the best care for her frustrated, unhappy daughter.

As soon as she was hired, Lawson began soliciting new funds from foundations, corporations (including Chevron, IBM and Safeway), churches and, eventually, such giant charities as the United Way. She established a $2,500 training fee for the four-month program—a charge which, depending upon a student's disability, is often paid by state and federal agencies. And she trimmed operating costs to the bone. "The restaurant was set up to be competitive, but it wasn't," she says. "People in Hayward thought of it in terms of a school cafeteria. I think they thought it was just a little nonprofit thing that got a lot of freebies."

Community response was lukewarm at first. "We had a lot of volunteers walking up and down the street handing out fliers and stuff," says Lawson. "But people said, 'Oh, I feel so sorry for those people, I don't want to come in.' The thing that eventually made a huge difference is that we have trainees delivering goods, going to the post office, to the grocery store. And the public has learned that these people are not frightening."

With time—and careful promotion—the Eden Express established itself as a pleasant retreat with competitive standards of service and cooking. "If we're not doing a good job, the customers just won't come back," says Lawson. "They don't care whether you're dealing with the disabled or not. If you don't get the food out quick, and it's not good food, then the heck with it."

Given the fact many of the trainees have spent their lives on the fringes—living on the streets or locked away in hospitals—it's hardly surprising that service occasionally slips. In ordinary restaurants, waiters only fantasize about snapping at rude customers; at the Eden Express, students with inadequate self-control have occasionally told them off. "Actually, there have been more [outbursts] from the customers than the trainees," says Lawson. "It's tough to get the service real good, because the minute a trainee gets good, we get 'em out there and into jobs."

Trainees begin slowly. Assigned to the laundry room at first, they work up to more demanding jobs in the kitchen and the dining room. Director of training Barbara Cymrot (who admits that she buses the occasional table, in addition to monitoring the progress of her 31 students) says that learning to handle stress is the job skill her charges need most. "You might learn how to wash dishes at 10 a.m., when there are relatively few people in the restaurant," she explains, "but all of a sudden you might be washing dishes at noon, and someone runs in and screams, 'Where are the forks?' Or let's say you dropped something and broke it. Well, some of these people might not show up the next day because they don't want to admit it. We want people to work through these situations here."

A manic depressive who has simply walked out of other jobs when they became too demanding, Jeanette, 31, has been at the Eden Express for three weeks, setting up the salad bar and baking cookies. "I feel I can kind of work at my own pace here," she says. "A lot is being expected of me, but I don't feel pressured."

Jeanette and her colleagues work at the restaurant from 15 to 40 hours a week, and their hourly wages are based on productivity; beginners receive 98 cents an hour, and the most advanced students earn $4.25. Tips are funneled into a scholarship fund. "It's a good program," Jeanette says. "Everyone is pulling together."

Despite the project's conspicuous success, Lawson and the board of directors are still facing challenges. With an annual budget of $380,000, the Eden Express is running in the red. Food sales, training fees and grants cover the overhead, but training expenses eat up potential profits. A recently signed contract to bake 300 dozen cookies a week for a California cookie company will bring in an estimated $10,000 yearly, but it won't solve the biggest problem facing the Express—a downtown renewal project that will drive up the program's $2,300-a-month rent or, more likely, force the restaurant to look for new quarters.

Some of the project's well-placed supporters will undoubtedly help cushion the blow. Hayward Mayor Alex Giuliani has served as guest chef, and city council members occasionally stop in for an Eden burger. "They're all in our corner," says Lawson. "They're concerned about us." But the biggest vote of confidence—and certainly the most encouraging—comes from employers who have put Express graduates to work. "They see that our folks know what they're doing," says training director Cymrot, "and they call to say, 'Send me two more.' "

THE 1988 REPORT OF THE COMMISSION ON THE BICENTENNIAL OF THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION

HON. LINDY (MRS. HALE) BOGGS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mrs. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, the Honorable Warren E. Burger, Chairman of the Commission on the Bicentennial of the United States Constitution released the Commission's 1988 annual report earlier this month. The report summarizes many of the activities the Commission plans for 1989 when the 200th anniversary of the Congress, the Presidency, and passage of the Judiciary Act of 1789 are observed.

I would like to include the text of this report in the RECORD since it contains much useful information.

COMMISSION ON THE BICENTENNIAL OF THE U.S. CONSTITUTION, WARREN E. BURGER, CHAIRMAN

At the beginning of its official life, the Commission resolved that some "fireworks and parades would be appropriate" but that, in the words of the Chairman's first Bicentennial speech, the Commission's prime objective would be "to give ourselves a five-year history and civics lesson."

Now, with the advent of the year 1989, Americans are looking forward to two historic celebrations.

Following on the heels of oath-taking by President Elect George Bush in Washington on January 20, the New York Commission will celebrate the 200th anniversary of the First Congress on March 4 and the inaugural of George Washington April 30, 1789.

The 200th anniversary celebration will begin April 16 with the reenactment of Washington's journey by carriage from his Mount Vernon, Va., home to New York City, the first capital under the federal Constitution.

The First Congress had already begun to gather there on the prescribed date, March 4, but not until April 1 did the Congress obtain a quorum and organize the House of Representatives, and until April 6 formally constitute the Senate.

On April 7 the two houses counted the ballots of the first electoral college and notified Washington by the slow and irregular postal communications of the time that he had been unanimously elected first President of the United States.

The reenactment of Washington's seven and one-half day journey to the nation's capital, by an actor wearing authentic period clothing and accoutrement, will symbolize for today's generations the fantastic changes in American life from two centuries ago.

Today George Washington's seven days' journey takes fifty minutes by air, only a little more than four hours by automobile and there is, of course, instant communication by radio, television, and telephone via space satellites.

"But it is also designed to emphasize the continuity and durability of the Constitution over the same 200-year span," Warren E. Burger, Chairman of the Constitution Bicentennial Commission, pointed out in a formal statement.

"The great breakthrough of representative government, with sovereignty still vested in the people themselves, has not only survived these sweeping social, economic, and technological changes but all its fundamental guarantees and rights are intact and stronger than ever."

The New Year marks the third in a five-year series of nationwide programs keyed to the bicentennial anniversary of the Constitution, coordinated and supported by the official national commission created by Congress in 1986.

The programs continue through 1991, when the work of creating the Constitution essentially as it still exists today was completed wih adoption of the Bill of Rights, the first ten amendments.

"The Bill of Rights made explicit some of the most precious, fundamental, and zealously guarded of our rights and privileges as Americans under what is now the world's oldest written constitution," Burger commented, "including the indispensable freedom of religion, speech, press, and assembly."

The year 1987 marked the anniversary of the drafting of the Constitution, completed on September 17, 1787, and heralded with national celebrations radiating out from Washington and Philadelphia.

In 1988 the anniversary of the Constitution's ratification occurred, and this year is the anniversary of the formation of the federal system itself, its powers carefully separated among an executive, legislative, and judicial branch.

The last significant date in the five years of programs will be December 15, 1991, anniversary of the final ratification of the Bill of Rights.

In addition to national events and ceremonies, the Commission is coordinating and supporting thousands of local and regional activities (including 108,000 schools), carried out to a great extent by volunteer services and financing.

Among other things, more than 10 million pocket-size copies of the Constitution have been distributed through a variety of channels.

Other activities include community-college forums, student essay contests, a student re-enactment of the constitutional Convention, adult community forums, films, television programs on famous constitutional cases and publications.

YEAR END REPORT, COMMISSION ON THE BICENTENNIAL OF THE U.S. CONSTITUTION

As the second full year of the Commission's five-year program of awareness and education comes to a close, it is safe to state that Americans are being exposed more than ever in our history to the events that led to the writing and development of our Constitutional form of government. The programs that have been developed, the events that have been staged, have all increased the awareness of this unique document. Many of them are ongoing, which means that an even greater number of Americans will be exposed to the history and civics lesson of the Constitution Bicentennial.

The following is a sampling of the programs and events of 1987 and 1988 to make our citizens aware of the Constitution.

EDUCATIONAL PROGRAMS

Essay Contests

The Commission sponsored two essay contests in 1987, one for high school students (co-sponsored by USA TODAY/Gannett) and one for law school students developed by West Publishing Company. Fourteen thousand essays were entered from 50 states and the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico.

Roads to Liberty Tour

American Express Company provided funding for the "Roads to Liberty: The Magna Carta to the Constitution" tour, which carried many historic documents (including an original Magna Carta) to over 100 cities from March to September, 1987. The 64-foot long trailer exhibited an original draft of the Magna Carta of 1215, a facsimile of the Mayflower Compact, an original draft of the Constitution, the Northwest Ordinance of 1787, the Connecticut Resolves and other documents which were viewed by millions of Americans.

Pocket Constitutions

Easily the most popular of all Commission publications is the 43-page pocket Constitution. This booklet contains the original text of the Constitution, the amendments, a list of historic dates in the development of the government under the Constitution, plus a unique descriptive word index. To date, over 10,000,000 have been distributed by the Commission and other entities.

The Walt Disney Company

Established an exhibit to the Bicentennial at DisneyWorld and DisneyLand; donated large murals of the Christy painting "The Signing of the Constitution" to 207 state capitols and federal buildings.

Xerox Corporation and RJR-Nabisco provided funding for September 16, 1987 "A Celebration of Citizenship," televised live from the steps of the U.S. Capitol by ABC.

National Bicentennial Competition

Working with the Center for Civic Education (Calabasas, Calif.), millions of senior high school students are taught a comprehensive course on the Constitution. Schools are then invited to participate in a competition, testing their students' knowledge of Constitutional matters against other schools. Continued success in the competition leads to the national finals in Washington in the spring. The top three schools in each state received awards with the state winner traveling to Washington for the national finals. In 1988, Gompers High School, San Diego, Calif., won top honors over 44 other state winners. New curricula have been developed for this year for fifth and eighth grades.

Convention Reenactment

Winners of the national essay writing competition from 50 states, the District of Columbia and the overseas territories, spent three days in historic Williamsburg, Virginia, in September 1987. They wrote their own "constitution," in mock convention held at the College of William and Mary. Their Constitution "tracked" the original, but added a line item veto power for the President, as well as a balanced budget amendment.

Historical Pictorial Map Contest

Designed to encourage the study of geography and history as it pertains to the Colonial and Founding Period, the contest is open to youngsters from fourth grade to high school. Outline maps and historic timelines have been sent to thousands of schools with assistance from National Geographic and United Parcel Service.

Education Grants

This annual program continues to be one of the foremost efforts in encouraging enhanced teaching of the Constitution in schools. In two years, the Commission has awarded $4.2 million to over 100 teacher training and curriculum development projects in 38 states. Another round of grants will be announced in late Spring 1989.

College-Community Forums

A series of public discussions has been designed to stimulate discussion and insight on the workings of each branch of government. These will include faculty, local leaders, journalists and citizens in a community setting.

Adult and Continuing Education

A program of learning materials on the Constitution for adult education has been developed. These materials will be used by schools and organizations that serve the adult learner. The Commission is also developing a "brown bag" lunch discussion series for government employees.

Department of Defense

One of the Commission's most zealous supporters in promoting the Bicentennial message, the Defense Department has developed numerous programs for use by military as well as civilian audiences. These include a "Constitution Commitment," which includes a re-affirmation of the induction oath by service personnel, pledging to "protect and defend" the Constitution. Through the Department of the Army the D-O-D has also produced considerable resource material that has been disseminated to public schools and libraries as well as military bases.

Bicentennial School and Bicentennial Campus Programs

All elementary, junior high (middle) and high schools, as well as all post-secondary institutions, are eligible. To become a Bicentennial School or Campus, an ongoing educational effort on the Constitution must be developed to offer various events and programs during the school year. To date, over 500 schools, junior colleges, colleges and universities have been recognized.

Educational Material

With assistance from Scholastic, Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, Bell Atlantic, Polaroid, ABC, CBS, National Geographic Society, United Parcel Service and the Liberty Bell Foundation, the Commission has provided quality educational material to 108,000 schools.

"Equal Justice Under Law"

Five historic Constitutional court cases on video tape are being distributed to education media centers, luncheon clubs and service organizations.

"Constitutional Journal"

A series of vignettes on the writing and ratification by award-winner author Jeffrey St. John is being republished in book form, and will be disseminated by the Commission to libraries and schools nationwide.

DAR Essay Contest

With Commission cosponsorship, the Daughters of the American Revolution is holding a special essay contest for high school juniors and seniors. The topic is: Under the Constitution, how do our responsibilities as We The People influence the Presidency and Congress in the discharge of their duties? The entry deadline is January 15, 1989.

Public Information

The Commission continues to offer the services of its Speakers Bureau and historic project registry.

PUBLIC AWARENESS PROGRAMS

A Celebration of Citizenship

On September 16, 1987, millions of Americans watched on ABC-TV as President Reagan, Chief Justice Rehnquist, Speaker James Wright with other leaders of Congress joining with Chief Justice Burger, Chairman of this Commission on the steps of the Capitol for a tribute to the Constitution. The program, sponsored by RJR-Nabisco and Xerox, ended with the President leading 140,000 people gathered in person plus millions via radio and television, in reciting the Pledge of Allegiance as the House and Senate had done a week earlier.

Constitution Week

As a follow up to the successful CELEBRATION OF CITIZENSHIP in September, 1987, the Commission launched an effort in 1988 to make Constitution Week (September 17-23) an annual, meaningful commemoration. Literature was distributed to thousands of local entities, encouraging them to take part.

Constitution Day, 1987

Philadelphia, site of the 1787 Constitutional Convention, was the scene of a mammoth three-hour parade on the 200th anniversary of the signing of the Constitution. Hundreds of bands, floats and military units marched through the city, as millions watched on television. At 4:00 (e.s.t.), the bells of the ringing of a replica of the Liberty Bell by 13 children representing the original states signalled the sounding of bells around the world in a 200-second salute to the signing. In the evening, an entertainment gala and lavish fireworks display provided a fitting climax to the day.

Journalism Awards

In 1988, the Commission, working with the National Press Foundation (print) and the Ohio State University (radio/television), presented awards to working journalists who produced the best stories in 1987 on the Bicentennial. A similar award for print journalists is planned for 1989.

Public Service Campaign

Working with the Advertising Council and a volunteer ad agency, the Commission has developed a series of print, radio and television ads dealing with the Constitution Bicentennial.

Project Literacy

The Commission is working with the PROJECT LITERACY U.S. (PLUS) to promote civic literacy. Viewers who respond to PLUS public service announcements on ABC-TV receive a Commission pocket Constitution, as well as literature on literacy.

Designated Bicentennial Communities

In an effort to make the Constitution Bicentennial a truly "grass-roots" commemoration, the Commission encouraged towns, cities, counties and states to set up their own bicentennial commissions to plan activities for their citizens. All 50 states, two territories and over 2,500 local entities established a commission to coordinate local events.

Independence Day Parade

The July 4th Parade in Washington, D.C., was a truly national event in 1987, as the Commission provided funding and program support which enabled the parade, with a Ratification theme, to be seen nationwide on public television stations.

Ethnic, Racial Minority, Disabled Programs

The Commission continues to create programs that involve all Americans, including the Constitution in braille.

Bicentennial Products

More than 90 firms have created merchandise designed to create awareness of the Constitution and generate interest in the Bicentennial by use of the official Commission logo. the latest Commission catalog displays many of these items.

Regional Bicentennial Leadership Conferences

Over the past two years, the Commission has sponsored 20 such conferences, bringing together state and local Bicentennial leaders, educators and civic, service and ethnic organization leaders to discuss methods of involving more Americans in the Bicentennial commemoration.

The success of the Commission in bringing the Bicentennial to the attention of the American public has been greatly enhanced by corporations, government agencies and service and civic groups. This assistance has been invaluable to us as we attempt to make the American public aware of the history of the Constitution, and its relevance in today's society.

Corporate America

McDonalds developed trayliners with Bicentennial themes; Roy Rogers has developed trayliners with Bicentennial themes; General Mills distributed millions of cereal boxes with anecdotes about the Constitution on the side panel; International Paper and Champion International produced millions of school lunch milk cartons with Bicentennial messages and logos; CitiCorp and Phillips Petroleum printed and distributed millions of the Commission's pocket Constitutions; American Hotel and Motel Association arranged for the Preamble and other Constitutional information to be placed on trayliners at hotel and motel coffee shops; AT&T and US Sprint provided international telephone calls to newly naturalized U.S. citizens after a Commission-sponsored induction ceremony on September 17, 1988; Reynolds Flexible Packaging has created "All-American" sandwich wrap, which features the Commission logo on one side and a quiz on the ratification of the Constitution on the other; ABC Television featured the Bicentennial in a program on adult literacy, developed a series of Constitutional anecdotes using Saturday morning cartoon characters to present the Constitution story to youngsters.

Network Television

ABC also presented a two-hour special on the Constitution September 16, 1987; CBS Television produced a series of one-minute vignettes on the Constitution in 1987, and a series on the Presidency in 1988.

In addition, CBS presented "It's Freedom, Charlie Brown," the Constitutional Convention featuring Charles Shultz's Peanuts characters; NBC Television used its program aimed at young teenagers Main Street to present a forum for explaining the Constitution; CNN produced a long series of short vignettes on various Constitutional themes.

Federal Agencies developed significant programs during the first two years of the Bicentennial. Significant contributions were made by the Department of Defense, the National Park Service, the Veterans' Administration, Office of Personnel Management, Immigration and Naturalization Service and many others.

THE FUTURE

SENTENCING COMMISSION UPHELD

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, I commend to the attention of my colleagues the following article which appeared in the Washington Post on January 19, 1989, describing the Supreme Court's overwhelming decision upholding the constitutionality of the 1984 Sentencing Reform Act.

As a member of the House Judiciary Committee which helped craft the 1984 act, I applaud the Court's decision. The wide application of the Sentencing Commission's guidelines in Federal cases will lead to more uniform and more fair sentencing.

Finally, I hope the Sentencing Reform Act will fulfill the dire predictions of its opponents who have said it will put more felons in more jails for longer periods of time.

The Post article follows:

COURT BACKS RULES ON SENTENCING—DECISION REMOVES DOUBTS ON VALIDITY OF 1984 REFORM ACT

(By Al Kamen)

The Supreme Court yesterday upheld the constitutionality of a sweeping overhaul of federal sentencing rules designed to reduce disparities in sentencing by limiting a judge's discretion and abolishing parole.

The court, in an 8-to-1 decision, put to rest doubts about the validity of thousands of sentences imposed under the Sentencing Reform Act of 1984 and overturned rulings by at least 150 district judges who had declared the law unconstitutional.

The U.S. Sentencing Commission, a seven-member panel established by the law to develop the new rules, estimated the court's action would require resentencing only 100 to 150 defendants sentenced by judges who opposed the law.

Justice Harry A. Blackmun, writing for the court in Mistretta v. U.S., rejected claims that the law violated constitutional requirements of separation of powers among the branches of government or delegated excessive authority to the sentencing commission.

Commission Chairman William W. Wilkins, Jr., a federal appeals judge, hailed the ruling as "one of the most important decisions handed down by the court this decade," and said the guidelines "dramatically improve the federal criminal justice system by ensuring more uniform, fair and truthful sentences."

Under the old system, judges had broad discretion in imposing terms, a situation that led to substantial disparities in sentences for similar crimes.

The new determinate sentencing, which covers crimes committed since Nov. 1, 1987, and affects about 40,000 federal defendants each year, eliminates virtually all discretion and makes the process more systematic. An "offense level" is assigned to each crime along with a mathematical formula providing for harsher or more lenient penalties depending upon a broad number of variables, such as age of the defendant or prior offenses.

Under the old system, someone sentenced to nine years in prison might be eligible for parole in three years. Under the new system, with parole eliminated, the same offender must serve nine years, with a maximum reduction of 54 days per year for good behavior while in prison.

Critics of the guidelines, in addition to having constitutional concerns, said they established substantially harsher penalties for many crimes and would worsen chronic prison overcrowding.

Alan B. Morrison, a Washington attorney who represented a Kansas City, Mo., drug dealer appealing a sentence under the new rules, said the "guidelines mean a lot more people are going to jail for a lot longer periods." Morrison said the ruling will "dramatically reduce" plea bargaining, leading to a substantial increase in the number of trials.

Wilkins agreed the new penalties are harsher for certain violent crimes or drug violations and for white collar crimes. "We are going to see an increase" in the prison population, he said, "but I don't think we are going to see any crisis in the prison system" as a result of the guidelines.

Blackmun, in a 51-page opinion that he said was "too long, I fear," acknowledged that the commission, which must include three judges among its seven members, "unquestionably is a peculiar institution within the framework of our government. Our constitutional principles of separated powers are not violated, however," Blackmun said, "by mere anomaly or innovation."

Making the commission part of the judicial branch "is not unconstitutional," he said, "unless Congress has vested in the commission powers that are more appropriately performed by the other branches or that undermine the integrity of the judiciary."

Blackmun said Congress did not improperly abdicate its obligations to make laws when it allows a commission to set the guidelines. Congress gave sufficient policy direction, he said, leaving the commission "the sort of intricate . . . task for which delegation to an expert body is especially appropriate."

Justice Antonin Scalia, the lone dissenter, said the majority "fails to recognize that this case is not about commingling" of the branches of government, "but about the creation of a new branch altogether, a sort of junior-varsity Congress.

"It may well be that in some circumstances such a branch would be desirable," Scalia said, "perhaps the agency before us here will prove to be so. But there are many desirable dispositions that do not accord with the constitutional structure we live under. And in the long run the improvisation of a constitutional structure on the basis of currently perceived utility will be disastrous."

Conservatives and liberals praised the ruling. Solicitor General Charles Fried, who had urged the court to uphold the law, said the guidelines were needed because "more moderate measures consistently failed" to correct what he said were "ugly, unjustified and often racially disparate sentences between judges and sometimes by the same judge. It was the shame of the federal judiciary."

And Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), a sponsor of the 1984 law, said "today's decision clears the way for long overdue reform of the current chaotic and unfair federal sentencing procedures . . . It is time to end the gross disparities in sentencing that permit too many convicted offenders to avoid any real punishment for their crimes."

Of the nearly 40,000 federal defendants who were sentenced in the 12 months after the guidelines went into effect Nov. 1, 1987, 5,651 committed crimes after that date and could have been sentenced under the guidelines, according to the commission. Of that number, only 1,187 were sentenced under the old system, but the time has run out to appeal in many of those cases. In addition, some defendants have already completed their sentences and others are likely to face stiffer sentences under the guidelines and are not expected to appeal.

THE WOLFSONIAN FOUNDATION

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. LEHMAN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, the Wolfsonian Foundation provides Miami with the cultural, historical, and educational enrichment that the Smithsonian has provided for Washington and the visitors to our Nation's Capital.

Mickey's horizons reach beyond just Miami. He is an unofficial but important United States presence in Italy, especially in Genoa and its vicinity. He has assumed responsibility and supported financially, a huge share of the Columbus Discovery Commemorative Fund that in 1992 will help to celebrate the 500th year anniversary of the discovery of America. However, Mickey and I share a special common interest. He is a railroad passenger enthusiast and a dedicated supporter of Amtrak.

As chairman of the Transportation Appropriations Subcommittee responsible for Federal support of Amtrak, I greatly appreciate having staunch allies like Mitchell Wolfson, Jr. For the benefit of my colleagues, following is some additional information on the accomplishments of my public spirited friend.

The Miami based Wolfsonian Foundation was established by Mitchell Wolfson, Jr. in 1986 to support and promote the collection, preservation, scholarly research, conservation and educational activities in the field of decorative, design and propaganda arts in the United States and abroad. The Foundation oversees the Mitchell Wolfson Jr. Collection of Decorative and Propaganda Arts, which consists of nearly 40,000 objects, primarily of American, British, Italian and German design created between 1875 and 1945. Selected objects continue to be added to the Collection with attention to the artistic, historic, social and cultural context in which each work was created. The Foundation also sponsors scholarly publications, seminars, conservation activities, and will soon provide study facilities for visiting scholars, as well as traveling exhibitions and an advanced computer data retrieval program providing scholars from around the world with access to the entire collection.

The Foundation is presently working on the development of two public institutions and their related programs: a research, study center and museum storage facility in Miami Beach Florida, and a house museum with galleries for changing exhibitions related to the collection in Genoa, Italy. The Miami Beach facility is scheduled for completion in 1990, while the Italian entity, Castello Mackenzie-Wolfson, is presently being restored prior to opening in 1992 as part of the Columbus Quincentenary activities in Italy.

PRESIDENT GEORGE BUSH'S INAUGURAL ADDRESS

HON. ROBERT H. MICHEL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, January 20, President George Bush made his inaugural address. It conveyed a spirit of warmth and good will, sincerity and strength. I was particularly impressed by the style, combining a conversational tone with an emphasis on ideas and values. In short, the President's address was a personal view of a public philosophy. As such, I believe it to be not only a memorable speech, but one that can serve as the philosophical and conceptual foundation of a successful administration. Too often the noble sentiments of an inaugural address are forgotten amidst the clash of political and ideological battles. President Bush's speech, however, is rooted in common sense and ordinary language. I believe its message can serve as a guide to action.

At this point I wish to include in the RECORD, the text of President George Bush's inaugural address, as printed in the New York Times, Saturday, January 21, 1989.

[From the New York Times, Jan. 21, 1989]

THE 41ST PRESIDENT: ASPIRATIONS, "NATION STANDS READY TO PUSH ON"

Following is a transcript of President Bush's Inaugural Address yesterday in Washington, as recorded by The New York Times. Because of slips in Mr. Bush's delivery, two sentences—indicated by italics—are taken from his prepared text.)

Mr. Chief Justice, Mr. President, Vice President Quayle, Senator Mitchell, Speaker Wright, Senator Dole, Congressman Michel and fellow citizens, neighbors and friends.

There is a man here who has earned a lasting place in our hearts and in our history. President Reagan, on behalf of our nation I thank you for the wonderful things that you have done for America.

I've just repeated word for word, the oath taken by George Washington 200 years ago, and the Bible on which I placed my hand is the Bible on which he placed his. It is right that the memory of Washington be with us today, not only because this is our Bicentennial Inauguration but because Washington remains the father of our country. And he would, I think, be gladdened by this day. For today is the concrete expression of a stunning fact: our continuity these 200 years since our Government began.

We meet on democracy's front porch, a good place to talk as neighbors and as friends. For this is a day when our nation is made whole, when our differences for a moment are suspended. And my first act as President is a prayer—I ask you to bow your heads.

"Heavenly Father, we bow our heads and thank You for Your love. Accept our thanks for the peace that yields this day and the shared faith that makes its continuance likely. Make us strong to do Your work, willing to heed and hear Your will, and write on our hearts these words: 'Use power to help people.' For we are given power not to advance our own purposes nor to make a great show in the world, nor a name. There is but one just use of power and it is to serve people. Help us remember, Lord. Amen."

I come before you and assume the Presidency at a moment rich with promise. We live in a peaceful, prosperous time but we can make it better. For a new breeze is blowing and a world refreshed by freedom seems reborn; for in man's heart, if not in fact, the day of the dictator is over. The totalitarian era is passing, its old ideas blown away like leaves from an ancient, lifeless tree.

"A NEW BREEZE IS BLOWING"

A new breeze is blowing—and a nation refreshed by freedom stands ready to push on. There's new ground to be broken and new action to be taken. There are times when the future seems thick as a fog; you sit and wait, hoping the mist will lift and reveal the right path.

But this is a time when the future seems a door you can walk right through—into a room called Tomorrow. Great nations of the world are moving toward democracy—through the door to freedom. Men and women of the world move toward free markets—through the door to prosperity. The people of the world agitate for free expression and free thought—through the door to the moral and intellectual satisfactions that only liberty allows.

We know what works: Freedom works. We know what's right: Freedom is right. We know how to secure a more just and prosperous life for man on earth: through free markets, free speech, free elections and the excercise of free will unhampered by the state.

For the first time in this century—for the first time in perhaps all history—man does not have to invent a system by which to live. We don't have to talk late into the night about which form of government is better. We don't have to wrest justice from the kings—we only have to summon it from within ourselves.

We must act on what we know. I take as my guide the hope of a saint: In crucial things, unity—in important things, diversity—in all things, generosity.

America today is a proud, free nation, decent and civil—a place we cannot help but love. We know in our hearts, not loudly and proudly but as a simple fact, that this country has meaning beyond what we see, and that our strength is a force for good.

Have we changed as a nation even in our time? Are we enthralled with material things, less appreciative of the nobility of work and sacrifice? My friends, we are not the sum of our possessions. They are not the measure of our lives. In our hearts we know what matters. We cannot hope only to leave our children a bigger car, a bigger bank account. We must hope to give them a sense of what it means to be a loyal friend, a loving parent, a citizen who leaves his home, his neighborhood and town better than he found it.

TAKING MEASURE OF SUCCESS

And what do we want the men and women who work with us to say when we're no longer there? That we were more driven to succeed than anyone around us? Or do we stop to ask if a sick child had gotten better, and stayed a moment there to trade a word of friendship.

No President, no government can teach us to remember what is best in what we are. But if the man you have chosen to lead this Government can help make a difference, if he can celebrate the quieter, deeper successes that are made not of gold and silk but of better hearts and finer souls; if he can do these things, then he must.

America is never wholly herself unless she is engaged in high moral principle. We as a people have such a purpose today. It is to make kinder the face of the nation and gentler the face of the world.

My friends, we have work to do. There are the homeless, lost and roaming. There are the children who have nothing—no love, no normalcy. There are those who cannot free themselves of enslavement to whatever addiction—drugs, welfare, the demoralization that rules the slums. There is crime to be conquered, the rough crime of the streets. There are young women to be helped who are about to become mothers of children they can't care for and might not love. They need our care, our guidance and our education, though we bless them for choosing life.

The old solution, the old way, was to think that public money alone could end these problems. But we have learned that that is not so. And in any case, our funds are low. We have a deficit to bring down. We have more will than wallet; but will is what we need.

We will make the hard choices, looking at what we have, perhaps allocating it differently, making our decisions based on honest need and prudent safety. And then we will do the wisest thing of all: We will turn to the only resource we have that in times of need always grow: the goodness and the courage of the American people.

A NEW KIND OF ACTIVISM

And I am speaking of a new engagement in the lives of others—a new activism, hands-on and involved, that gets the job done. We must bring in the generations, harnessing the unused talent of the elderly and the unfocused energy of the young. For not only leadership is passed from generation to generation, but so is stewardship. And the generation born after the Second World War has come of age.

I've spoken of a thousand points of light—of all the community organizations that are spread like stars throughout the nation doing good. We will work hand in hand, encouraging, sometimes leading, sometimes being led, rewarding. We will work on this in the White House, in the Cabinet agencies. I will go to the people and the programs that are the brighter points of light, and I'll ask every member of my Government to become involved. The old ideas are new again because they're not old, they are timeless: duty, sacrifice, commitment, and a patriotism that finds its expression in taking part and pitching in.

And we need a new engagement, too, between the Executive and the Congress. The challenges before us will be thrashed out with the White—with the House and the Senate. And we must bring the Federal budget into balance. And we must insure that America stands before the world united: strong, at peace and fiscally sound. But, of course, things may be difficult.

We need compromise; we've had dissension. We need harmony; we've had a chorus of discordant voices. For Congress, too, has changed in our time. There's grown a certain divisiveness. We've seen the hard looks and heard the statements in which not each other's ideas are challenged, but each other's motives. And our great parties have too often been far apart and untrusting of each other.

It's been this way since Vietnam: That war cleaves us still. But, friends, that war began in earnest a quarter of a century ago; and surely the statute of limitations has been reached. This is a fact: The final lesson of Vietnam is that no great nation can long afford to be sundered by a memory.

A new breeze is blowing—and the old bipartisanship must be made new again.

AGE OF THE OFFERED HAND

To my friends—and yes, I do mean friends—in the loyal opposition—and yes, I mean loyal—I put out my hand, I'm putting out my hand to you, Mr. Speaker, I'm putting out my hand to you, Mr. Majority Leader. For this is the thing: This is the age of the offered hand. And we can't turn back clocks, and I don't want to. But when our fathers were young, Mr. Speaker, our differences ended at the water's edge. And we don't wish to turn back time, but when our mothers were young, Mr. Majority Leader, the Congress and the Executive were capable of working together to produce a budget on which this nation could live. Let us negotiate soon and hard, but in the end let us produce.

The American people await action. They don't send us here to bicker. They asked us to rise above the merely partisan. In crucial things, unity—and this, my friends, is crucial.

To the world, too, we offer new engagement and a renewed vow: We will stay strong to protect the peace. The "offered hand" is a reluctant fist; but the fist, once made, is strong and can be used with great effect.

There are today Americans who are held against their will in foreign lands, and Americans who are unaccounted for. Assistance can be shown here and will be long remembered. Good will begets good will. Good faith can be a spiral that endlessly moves on.

"Great nations like great men must keep their word" When America says something, America means it, whether a treaty or an agreement or a vow made on marble steps. We will always try to speak clearly, for candor is a compliment. But subtlety, too, is good and has its place.

While keeping our alliances and friendships around the world strong, ever strong, we will continue the new closeness with the Soviet Union, consistent both with our security and with progress. One might say that our new relationship in part reflects the triumph of hope and strength over experience. But hope is good. And so is strength, and vigilance.

ALL PART OF A CONTINUUM

Here today are tens of thousands of our citizens who feel the understandable satisfaction of those who have taken part in democracy and seen their hopes fulfilled. But my thoughts have been turning in the past few days to those who would be watching at home—to an older fellow who will throw a salute by himself when the flag goes by, and the woman who will tell their sons the words of the battle hymns. I don't mean this to be sentimental. I mean that on days like this we remember that we are all part of a continuum, inescapably connected by the ties that bind.

Our children are watching in schools, throughout our great land. And to them I say, thank you for watching democracy's big day. For democracy belongs to us all and freedom is like a beautiful kite that can go higher and higher with the breeze. And to all I say: No matter what your circumstances or where you are, you are part of this day. You are part of the life of our great nation.

A President is neither prince nor pope, and I don't seek "a window on men's souls." In fact, I yearn for a greater tolerance, and easy-goingness about each others attitudes and way of life.

There are few clear areas in which we as a society must rise up united and express our intolerance and the most obvious now is drugs. And when that first cocaine was smuggled in on a ship, it may as well have been a deadly bacteria, so much as it hurt the body, the soul of our country. And there is much to be done and to be said, but take my word for it: This scourge will stop.

And so, there is much to do; and tomorrow the work begins. And I do not mistrust the future; I do not fear what is ahead. For our problems are large, but our heart is larger. Our challenges are great, but our will is greater. And if our flaws are endless, God's love is truly boundless.

Some see leadership as high drama, and the sound of trumpets calling. And sometimes it is that. But I see history as a book with many pages—and each day we fill a page with acts of hopefulness and meaning.

The new breeze blows, a page turns, the story unfolds—and so today a chapter begins: a small and stately story of unity, diversity and generosity—shared and written together.

Thank you, God bless you God bless the United States of America.

PECOS AND EAST FORK OF JEMEZ WILD AND SCENIC RIVERS BILL

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, many people have a vision of New Mexico filled with brilliant red mesas, azure skies and quiet expanses of remote desert. While New Mexico is blessed with these scenic assets, it also includes snow-capped peaks and wild rivers rushing through alpine forests and lush mountain meadows. Today, I am proud to introduce legislation adding two of New Mexico's high mountain rivers, the Pecos and the East Fork of the Jemez, to the National Wild and Scenic Rivers System.

The Pecos River, renowned in folk tales of the West, originates high in the Pecos Wilderness of the Santa Fe National Forest. Flowing from headwaters above timberline in the Sangre de Cristo Mountains, the Pecos descends through rugged granite canyons alternating with mountain meadows in small, beautiful high elevation valleys. Popular wilderness camping and swimming areas, waterfalls and trails are bound by a rich mosaic of aspen, spruce, fir, and alpine meadows. This 13.5-mile segment is entirely in the wilderness.

The Pecos then enters a broader section of the canyon that is more accessible and is very popular for fishing. After 4 miles, the Pecos is joined by the Rio Mora, a major tributary which also originates high in the wilderness. The canyon then narrows into the area known as the "Pecos Box." The river is flanked by large granite walls that rise several hundred feet. This entire section of the river from the headwaters through the Pecos Box to the small community of Terraro, approximately 20.5 miles, is designated as a wild and scenic river in my bill.

The East Fork of the Jemez River originates in the Valles Caldera, as a small meandering stream in the vast, grassland crater. Flowing south and west, it cuts a rugged, sheer-walled canyon by the time it reaches the Santa Fe National Forest boundary. In the national forest, the river continues in the canyon containing the southern-most extension of Canadian dogwood. The river flows past a small campground, under a highway, and again enters a rugged stretch of canyon. The sheer rhyolite cliffs and huge boulders are crowned with thick forests of Engelmann Spruce and mixed conifer. The river flows from canyon wall to canyon wall, making passage impossible without wading, swimming or rock scrambling. Swimming and fishing holes are found in smooth rock basins and cracks. Occasional wide areas in the canyon are filled with lush meadows.

The East Fork continues through more rugged canyon, passing near Jemez Falls campground and a hot spring, finally joining with the Rio San Antonio to form the Jemez River at Battleship Rock picnic area. This legislation would designate the 11-mile segment of the East Fork from the national forest boundary to the confluence with the Rio San Antonio as a wild and scenic river.

The East Fork flows through the heart of the most popular recreation area in the Jemez Mountains. It is less than a 2 hour drive from Albuquerque and Santa Fe, and less than an hour from Los Alamos and the Espanola Valley. A popular hiking trail runs along the river and will be nominated for national recreational trail status upon completion. The East Fork and the canyon area are within the feeding zone of the peregrine falcon. The State listed Jemez Mountain Salamander, unique to the Jemez Mountains, is also found within the river canyon.

Designation of the Pecos and East Fork of the Jemez as wild and scenic rivers will ensure their protection and highlight the value of these rivers as important recreation resources in northern New Mexico. The free-flowing character of the rivers and the high water quality will be maintained. The U.S. Forest Service has recommended both the Pecos River and the East Fork of the Jemez River for wild and scenic designation in the Santa Fe National Forest management plan. Almost all of the river segments included in this bill are on national forest land. Therefore, under the Wild and Scenic Rivers Act, there will be no authority for condemnation of private inholdings. In addition, the Forest Service concludes that wild and scenic designation will have little effect on present timber harvesting and grazing because the Pecos is in a wilderness area and the East Fork is managed with an emphasis on semiprimitive nonmotorized recreation.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation will protect and highlight the historic Pecos River and the beautiful East Fork of the Jemez River for the enjoyment of present and future generations. I urge my colleagues to join me in adding these two great New Mexico rivers to the National Wild and Scenic Rivers System. Thank you.

IN MEMORIAM: JOHN E. LAWE

HON. THOMAS J. MANTON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. MANTON. Mr. Speaker, it is with a deep sense of sadness that I rise to mark the death of John E. Lawe, president of the Transport Workers Union of America, who passed away on January 5, 1989, after a long battle with cancer. John Lawe was one of the most respected and effective labor leaders in the Nation. John was also an influential leader in the Irish community. He was someone I was indeed proud to call a friend.

Mr. Speaker, John Lawe emigrated from Ireland in 1949 at the age of 30. He went to work for the Fifth Avenue Coach Co., and for 17 years he serviced and drove buses in Manhattan. During this time, he was active in Transport Workers Union [TWU] Local 100. He began his successful union career in 1953 when he became shop steward at the company's 132d Street garage. He also served as a division recording secretary and chairman, and vice president of local 100. In 1977, he became president of local 100. He led the union during a very difficult time of labor-management strife, and intraunion struggles. However, John was successful in strengthening the union. He was known as a tough, but fair and affable negotiator who always won as many union demands as possible.

In 1985, he was elected international president of the TWU of America. In addition to his TWU duties, John served as second vice president of the New York City Central Labor Council and vice president of the New York State AFL–CIO.

Mr. Speaker, John Lawe was born in 1919, in Kilglass, Strokestown, County Roscommon. As the son of an Irish immigrant, I deeply respected and admired John Lawe. My father was also born in County Roscommon, and like John, immigrated to America. John took every advantage of the opportunities available to him in the United States, and he rose to become a leader in the labor movement. But John never forgot Ireland, and he was always an active and prominent figure in the Irish-American community. In 1986, he was named "Irishman of the Year" by the Grand Council of United Emerald Societies for his outstanding work on behalf of the victims of repression in Northern Ireland. In 1987, he served as grand marshal of the St. Patrick's Day Parade. John was also a key figure in the Irish-American labor coalition.

Mr. Speaker, those of us concerned about the repression of the Catholic minority in Northern Ireland lost a strong and powerful voice with the death of John E. Lawe. However, I am certain the work John Lawe did for the victims in Northern Ireland will continue to be felt in the years ahead. John will be missed, but his legacy will endure forever.

Mr. Speaker, I want to extend my deepest sympathies to John's wife, family, and friends.

A TRIBUTE TO DAVID COBB

HON. BOB CLEMENT

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. CLEMENT. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to honor a man who coined a phrase that helped my hometown, Nashville, TN, a place that is known worldwide.

Mr. David Cobb, an announcer at WSM radio in Nashville, flagship station for the "Grand Ole Opry," is the man who coined the phrase . . . "Music City, USA."

A radio pioneer, Mr. Cobb recently passed away at the age of 76.

He spent 35 years with WSM Incorporated and was one of the first three announcers at the Grand Old Opry. He was also the staff announcer heard nationally on NBC Television programs in the 1940's, so I am sure that many of my colleagues and millions of Americans have heard his voice in their living rooms.

Around the year 1960 Mr. Cobb ad libbed that "the sounds listeners were hearing on WSM radio came from 'Music City, USA.'" country music.

Although this contribution by Mr. Cobb is invaluable and will last through the ages, it is only one of the many significant contributions he made to his city and industry during his illustrious career.

It is only fitting and proper that he be recognized and saluted for a life that touched so many persons in such a positive way.

I want to submit an article printed in the Tennessean newspaper in Nashville that honors this man. It also recognizes his accomplishments and contributions to his hometown and his industry. I urge all of my colleagues to read this article and realize that Mr. David Cobb was a unique individual who will be sorely missed.

EX-WSM ANNOUNCER DAVID COBB, 76, DIES

(By Clara Hieronymus)

David Cobb, 76, who coined the phrase that was to identify Nashville all over the world as "Music City, USA" has died following heart surgery.

In keeping with his wishes, the body was cremated and there will be no funeral service. A private memorial is to be held at a future date.

Mr. Cobb's 35-year affiliation with WSM Inc.—1937–1972—is bound up with the history of music in Nashville.

He was an announcer with the AM station before the days of FM radio and, with Louie Buck and Judd Collins, was one of the first three announcers at the Grand Ole Opry.

His death came Saturday in Park View Medical Center where he had been admitted on Dec. 9 and underwent surgery Dec. 14 for atheroschlerosis.

WSM production manager Tom Bryant said Mr. Cobb was the staff announcer heard nationally on NBC programs in the 1940s, and recalled that he was the announcer for the WSM broadcasts of the Nashville Symphony Orchestra.

"He had a vast store of classical knowledge and, for years, hosted every music show on the station. He was especially fond of light classical music and hosted a longtime evening music program for B.H. Stief Jewelers," Bryant said.

WSM's Grant Turner recalled that Mr. Cobb had a Sunday night music show called The World of Classical Music, and that in 1947 he was the first announcer for Ernest Tubb's Midnight Jamboree.

His range of interests was wide in music, especially classical music, and in the literature and history of music.

He did a number of network programs for WSM, and served a year as president of AFTRA, the televison and radio performers' union, and was a member of its board of directors at the time of his death.

Another colleague, Ottis Devine described him as "a very talented man who did a wonderful job for WSM."

It was about 1960 that Mr. Cobb, according to an account in The Nashville Tennessean, ad libbed that "the sounds listeners were hearing on WSM radio were coming from 'Music City, USA.'"

The reporter added in that Nov. 5, 1964, item that "David didn't bother to copyright the phrase or even to boast that he had dreamed it up. But it hit with an impact seldom felt in the industry. His chance remark led to a slogan which has been repeated countless times and has become the symbol of Nashville."

Former WSM President John DeWitt recalled him as "a very unusual and a very bright person who was different from most radio people. He had different ideas from other people, a well-educated man though not a standard type. He would always connect through with something bright and unusual.

"Back when FM first came on the scene, he would create a symphony situation as he described the music to be played, and even supplied the applause afterward. He was always a sort of maverick, but he was usually right."

Back in the 1940s, according to longtime WSM staffer Judd Collins, Mr. Cobb was "a pleasant guy to be around. I always thought he was a little smarter than the rest of us. He was a good announcer, with more of a feel for classical music than for country."

He was as off-beat in his dress and appearance as he was in his attitude toward life. He often sported a mustache or a beard before anyone else considered it appropriate. He got along well with country music people who appreciated his wit and candor.

And, it's true that he enjoyed being outspoken and individualistic. After his retirement from WSM, he became a frequent writer of letters to the editor and his strongly opinionated but logical letters earned him annual invitations to The Tennessean's Three Star Forum banquets, which he attended without fail.

He also wrote items for The Tennessean's Nashville Eye column, with often acrid, off-the-wall personal observations which elicited strong reactions—both pro and con—from other readers.

Collins spoke of him as a man with remarkable recall and pronounced dramatic flair.

"He made friends for WSM," Collins said.

Irving Waugh, who succeeded Jack DeWitt as WSM president, spoke of Mr. Cobb as a unique individual who was "totally his own man. He had a brilliant mind that was packed with quickly retrievable information. David was a free thinker when there weren't many free thinkers around."

"He was part of what I think of as a very unique staff: Judd Collins, Lionel Ricau, Ott Devine, Louie Buck and David. It was a time when radio was heavily news oriented and recorded information was not permitted except as sound effects.

"There were no recorded spots, but this team did news, classical music, and sports, with backup choral singers and piano. David could do all of it, everything except sports."

Mr. Cobb, a native of Cleveland, is survived by his wife, Jeanne; a son, Tony, of Baltimore; and three grandchildren. He and Jeanne celebrated their 50th wedding anniversary last March.

His father was a medical doctor and his mother an amateur musician who encouraged her son's interest in music.

He was not interested in going to college and was self-taught in music, literature and theater, and once taught a course in music appreciation at the University of Tennessee-Nashville.

He played classical guitar, and acted in productions in the old Community Playhouse, including Oliver with the late Barbara Moore, and in Dracula at Franklin's Pull-Tight Players theater, among other shows.

He had roles in several films, including Rhinestone, Love Leads the Way, and The Life of Jesse James. He often said that the highlight of his life was getting to go to Hollywood to be in Rhinestone.

During World War II, Mr. Cobb served in the Navy and was assigned to heavy cruiser duty in the battles of Okinawa and Iwo Jima.

PUBLIC LAND RIP-OFF: OIL SHALE LANDS GOING FOR $2.50 AN ACRE

HON. NICK JOE RAHALL II

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation aimed at stopping one of the biggest public land rip-offs in the history of this Nation.

Under the guise of a law enacted in 1872 to promote mineral development, thousands of acres of public lands claimed to contain valuable oil shale deposits have been sold for a mere $2.50 an acre. That was not a typographical error. On a per acre basis, the Interior Department has, and still intends to, sell off Federal lands for less than what it costs to buy a six-pack of Coca-Cola.

This practice, Mr. Speaker, is an affront to the American people who are entitled to expect from their Government the responsible and sound stewardship of our national public lands heritage.

I am honored to say that joining in the introduction of this bill are the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, MO UDALL; the chairman of the Subcommittee on National Parks and Public Lands, BRUCE VENTO; the chairman of the Subcommittee on Water and Power Resources, GEORGE MILLER; the chairman of the Subcommittee on Interior, SIDNEY YATES; and the gentleman from Colorado, who tirelessly fought for the enactment of this very same legislation during the last Congress, BEN NIGHTHORSE CAMPBELL.

This legislation addresses claims made for oil shale lands prior to 1920 under the auspices of the mining law of 1872. Under that law, a citizen could locate a mining claim to "valuable mineral deposits" whose physical "discovery" was required before the claim could be considered valid. A valid claim entitled the holder to exclusive possession of the surface for the purposes of mining the claim and title to the minerals extracted. The locator of the claim could also seek title to the land from the Federal Government upon a showing that the claim was valid, which entailed proving the claim was properly located, represented a discovery of a valuable mineral deposit and that a prescribed minimal amount of work had been conducted on the claim. The title would be issued in a form known as a patent for $2.50 per acre for an oil shale placer claim.

For oil shale, this practice was ended in 1920 by Congress with the Mineral Leasing Act under which oil shale could only be leased from the Federal Government in return for payment of rentals, royalties, and bonuses with the Government retaining title to the land and the minerals. However, while the 1920 act prohibited further claiming of oil shale lands, section 37 of the statute—the "Savings Clause"—stated that valid oil shale claims existing on the date of enactment were still eligible to receive patents if maintained in compliance with the Mining Law of 1872.

Which leads us to 1986, when a Colorado district court judge in one of those decisions which brings howls of protest paved the way for the issuance of 41 patents for oil shale claims on approximately 82,000 acres of public lands. The case should have been appealed. However, in a move that caused many of us to scramble for our history books to read up on the Teapot Dome scandal, the Interior Department instead choose to enter into a settlement agreement with the claim holders and title to these lands has since been transferred for $2.50 an acre to companies and individuals holding the claims. This action created renewed public and congressional interest in this matter.

Today, approximately 1,600 unpatented claims are still in existence covering about 228,000 acres of public land. From the time the claims were made prior to 1920, little to no mining-related work has been done on them. The land certainly has not been utilized for the purpose for which the claims were located, being oil shale development. In fact, it is highly questionable whether these claims have been held all of these years in compliance with the law. In effect, many of the claims may not be valid and should be extinguished.

Mr. Speaker, the Congress in enacting the mining law of 1872 and the Mineral Leasing Act of 1920 intended for these statutes to promote and facilitate mining on public lands. Yet, for the most part, the holders of oil shale claims have managed to elude the intent and purpose of these laws. Despite the fact that many of these claims have been held for over 100 years, the claim holders have yet to taken any actions to develop them. I would submit that the holders of these oil shale claims have had ample opportunity to move toward the development of the mineral resource which they have claimed under the mining laws. It is, in effect, long past the time for them to fish or cut bait.

There are other public interest issues at stake here as well. These lands hold significant wildlife, agricultural, recreational, scenic, and other values. The continued existence of dormant oil shale claims impedes the management of these lands, and the disposal of this property by patent significantly jeopardizes our national policy of multiple use of public lands not withdrawn for specific public interest purposes.

The legislation we are introducing today is the same bill which overwhelmingly passed the House in 1987. It would prohibit the issuance of patents for any oil shale claim for which a patent application had not been filed and all requirements for a patent had not been fully complied with by today, the date of introduction of the bill. The Secretary would also be required to undertake an expedited program to determine the validity of all unpatented oil shale claims within 2 years after enactment. If a claim is found to be invalid, it would be canceled.

For holders of valid oil shale claims, the legislation provides them with the option of either converting the claim to an oil shale lease or continuing to maintain the claim in compliance with a new diligent development expenditure requirement. The legislation would also ensure that any person who holds an oil shale lease or oil shale claim would be required to reclaim the site and post a bond before disturbance of the site to guarantee the reclamation.

Mr. Speaker, it is my intention as chairman of the Subcommittee on Mining and Natural Resources to move this bill in an expedited fashion.

I extend my sincerest congratulations to Steve on his many accomplishments, and my best wishes for a successful and fulfilling future.

A TRIBUTE TO HABITAT TO HUMANITY AND ELECTRIC BOAT

HON. CLAUDINE SCHNEIDER

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Miss SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, one of the more pressing problems facing Rhode Island is the lack of affordable housing available to moderate income families. Rhode Island's greatest resource in our effort to build more affordable housing is our people. I would like to take this opportunity to recognize two groups, Habitat for Humanity and General Dynamic's Electric Boat Division, for their dedication and hard work in addressing the need for affordable housing. I would like to enter into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article from Together, a General Dynamics publication, as an example of what can be achieved by people offering their time and labor to help others.

JESUS DIDN'T SECLUDE HIMSELF IN THE SUBURBS

The neighborhood around Elma and Broad streets in South Providence, R.I., is what people not up on the latest jargon might call "run-down." The three-decker clapboard tenements, built in the 1920s to house the laborers in the state's textile industry, stand neglected or abandoned. The stores on Broad Street are protected by heavy bars on windows and doors. On most weekends, this is where you can find Daniel Di Biasio, a shipfitter at Electric Boat's Quonset Point facility, applying his carpentry skills for Habitat for Humanity, a national organization that builds or rehabs homes for low-income families. "Jesus," says Di Biasio, "didn't seclude himself in the suburbs."

I LOVE PEOPLE IN DEED, NOT JUST IN WORD

If not measured by miles, South Providence is a long way from the city's suburbs. A couple of blocks from the first house that Rhode Island's Habitat chapter is constructing on Elma sits the abandoned Roger Williams Housing Project, its barracks-like buildings a refuge for drifters and forbidden playground for children. Gentrification, the return of middle-class residents into deteriorating city blocks, has come to some sections of the area. But much of it is still available for the kind of project that attracts Habitat and the volunteers who support the organization's goal: "Building houses in partnership with God's people in need."

"There is a great need for low-cost housing in Providence," says the Rev. Carol Millette, president of Habitat-Rhode Island and an Episcopal deacon at St. Peter's and St. Andrew's Church. "What's available is either substandard or overpriced." The duplex at 29 Elma Street won't be. The two families chosen by Habitat's selection committee, headed by Di Biasio, will have contributed about 500 hours of "sweat equity" to the building's construction, and will then pay about $350 a month on their no-interest 20- to 25-year mortgage. Almost all labor on the house is voluntary, and many of the construction materials and tools are donated by local merchants. Habitat's funds for the purchase of everything else that's needed comes from donations by churches and individuals or from no-interest loans.

Habitat has built more than 3,000 homes since it was founded in 1976. The pace of construction is accelerating. In 1987, the organization built 1,200 dwellings and hopes to reach 2,000 in 1988. With volunteers such as Di Biasio, this goal seems realistic. "I love people in deed, not just in word," he says. "I believe in demonstrating our love through actions. To me, each house (built) is a sermon showing God's love."

Seventeen teenagers from the Baptist Youth Fellowship of the First Baptist Church in Penfield, N.Y., are preaching a sermon of their own in Groton, Conn. To the tunes of soft rock, they are painting and sawing and hammering on the house at 97 Truman Street, a house purchased for rehabbing by the Habitat chapter of Southeastern Connecticut. The group of 12- to 18-year-olds is led by Kathy Thon on this, their second Habitat project of the summer. "First we stayed at school in South Carolina and worked on a house there," she says, "and then we looked for something in New England. We'll put in 40 hours this week. We're sleeping at the Old Mystic Baptist Church and go for a swim every day after work because there is no shower."

There is a shower in the house on Benham Street that is within walking distance of Electric Boat Division. The division has leased the building for $1 a year to Habitat's Project Coordinator, Karen Hall. "This allows me to donate two-thirds of my compensation to Habitat," says Hall, "to recruit labor, deal with inspectors and solicit publicity for our projects. The house on Truman Street is the first property our chapter bought. We had it totally gutted, we're stripping the exterior and rebuilding the interior. Electric Boat is giving us a lot of fixtures like furnaces and water heaters from properties that were demolished. The place on Truman Street is going to be a two-family home for low-income families. We've already selected one family."

Much of the progress on this project was achieved with the help of Hank Buermeyer, senior program coordinator on the division's United Kingdom Trident submarine program. Buermeyer is on Habitat's board of directors and has the professional contacts in Groton that make licensed electricians and plumbers show up and needed construction material appear. He and the kids from upstate New York are part of a housewarming coming soon to Truman Street.

INTRODUCTION OF THE NATIONAL GROUND WATER CONTAMINATION RESEARCH ACT OF 1989

HON. SAM GEJDENSON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to announce that I have recently reintroduced the National Ground Water Contamination Research Act that the House of Representatives overwhelmingly accepted by a vote of 399 to 15 in the 100th Congress.

As you well know, ground water contamination is one of the most serious environmental problems facing this Nation. It has occurred all over the country and the number of wells closed because of contamination increases every day. Ground water supplies almost one-half of the Nation with drinking water, and 90 percent of the Nation's rural population with drinking water.

My home State of Connecticut provides an alarming example of how fast the ground water contamination is growing. When I first introduced this legislation in 1985, 1,000 wells had been closed because of contamination in Connecticut. Since December 1985, 200 more tainted wells have been discovered in Connecticut, adding up to a total of 1,200 wells closed across the State.

My interest in the ground water problem goes back to 1982, when I met with families living on pink row, in Montville, CT, who had just learned that their water was contaminated with trichlorethylene [TCE], a cancer-causing chemical. I cannot even begin to convey the fears and frustrations of the parents who discovered that for years their children had been drinking and bathing in water tainted with toxic chemicals.

In addition to the health risks, ground water contamination has serious economic consequences. At a congressional field hearing in Hartford, Ms. Jane Shea of Ellington, CT, testified that her home became virtually worthless after it was discovered that her well was contaminated with the pesticide ethylene dibromide [EDB]. During the 2-year period that her neighborhood struggled with the EDB problem, not a single home was sold in the area. And the cost of extending the town water lines to the homes with tainted wells was over $500,000.

Stories like these are becoming all too common. Every State in the Nation has had wells closed because of contamination and the problem is getting worse.

Unfortunately, a major barrier to the protection of this critical resource from contamination is the lack of basic information on the problem. Industry, environmentalists, farmers and State and local officials all agree that more information is needed now. The primary purpose of the National Ground Water Contamination Research Act is to provide up-to-date information to the Federal, State, and local decisionmakers who need it.

This legislation is identical to H.R. 791, which was passed by the House last year. It authorizes a comprehensive Federal ground water research effort by the U.S. Geological Survey, the Environmental Protection Agency [EPA] and the Department of Agriculture [USDA]. This bill establishes an Interagency Ground Water Research Committee to coordinate the efforts of the different agencies and to ensure that there is no duplication of research efforts. It also recognizes and increases the strengths of the Federal agencies with major ground water research responsibilities.

This bill authorizes $81 million in new spending over the next 3 years. In the long run, measures to protect ground water, like this one, will cost far less and yield far better results than emergency responses to individual cases of ground water contamination. The $9 billion Superfund Program is a sad example of the exorbitant costs of cleaning up ground water.

For two reasons it is vital that the Federal Government develop a comprehensive and coordinated body of ground water information. The first is that ground water contamination knows no boundries. It may be impossible for local authorities to clean up a polluted well if the source of contamination is in another State or town. Second, the State and local agencies who must deal with contamination problems as they happen need the most comprehensive and up-to-date information available. As we learn about sources of contamination, ways that pollutants move through aquifers and methods of cleanup, we need to provide that information to officials around the country who can benefit from it.

Mr. Speaker, I strongly urge my colleagues to join me again in supporting the National Ground Water Contamination Research Act. This legislation is a crucial first step that the Federal Government must take to solve the Ground Water contamination problem. Until we understand what is causing contamination and how widespread it is, we will continue to simply throw money at the problem in response to individual cases. The National Ground Water Contamination Research Act will provide the information that we need to develop intelligent solutions to ground water problems.

LEGISLATION TO RELIEVE BELEAGURED DOMESTIC FOOTWEAR INDUSTRY

HON. WILLIAM F. GOODLING

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing in the 101st Congress legislation to maintain the 17-percent share of the U.S. market which supports our domestic footwear industry.

My legislation will provide 5 years of relief for this beleagured industry—which has an aggressive strategy with which to acquire new equipment, increase productivity, and reduce the price gap. The bill retains imports at record levels; there will be no rollback. The industry will benefit from market expansion only.

In all the political debate in the last Congress concerning H.R. 1154, the Textile and Apparel Trade Act of 1987, the sad state of the domestic footwear industry was forgotten. Also forgotten is the fact that the International Trade Commission [ITC] has unanimously voted relief for the industry four times in 10 years—only to have the executive branch deny action in all but one instance.

Most recently, in 1985 the ITC viewed the rise in import penetration from 49.5 percent in 1980 to 71 percent in 1984 with serious alarm. Taking into account the wage differential—Taiwan, $1.31/hour; Korea, $1.01/hour; Brazil $0.72/hour, the closed markets and high tariffs which divert imports to the world's only open market here in the United States, the fact that other countries' shoe industries are directly or indirectly subsidized, and the national security implications of the reduced industry capacity, the Commission unanimously voted global relief. The administration refused to act on the ruling, and the industry experienced a further 10-percent increase in market penetration in the following 2 years.

Nor has the happy state of the economy as a whole assisted the footwear industry. I have recently learned that yet another footwear company will close a factory in Hanover, PA, in March. In this instance, the rising cost of labor is to blame. However, some of the 200 jobs my district is losing could have been saved if the administration had acted—or the Congress had voted to override the President's veto of the Textile and Apparel Trade Act—because the industry needs the time provided by my legislation to continue its modernization. Automation is less labor intensive, but an automated open plant produces more jobs than any closed facility.

Struggling against unfair competition, the industry has not been idle. Despite the cost, and knowing the wave of the future, our footwear industry has modernized itself into the most technologically advanced in the world. Additional technology can be brought on line to further reduce the wage differential, but further capital investment is difficult to justify for an industry which has experienced 371 plant closings in the past 7 years.

For the shoe industry, which still employs 141,000 across 38 States, this is not a political question, it is a matter of survival.

ALASKAN OIL: LET'S NOT EXPORT A VITAL RESOURCE

HON. HOWARD WOLPE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, in 1973, Congress opened Alaska's North Slope for oil production, but insisted that its output be consumed within the United States unless exports could be shown to be in the national interest. These restrictions, repeatedly reaffirmed by a bipartisan Congress, have reduced U.S. dependence on OPEC oil, increased U.S. conventional military preparedness, and saved consumers billions of dollars.

Section 7(d) of the Export Administration Act of 1979, which contains the current export restrictions, will expire on September 30, 1990. There are those, including Pacific Rim countries, who would like to see these restrictions eliminated. However, such a move would make no sense from the standpoint of American economic and national security interests. That is why Congresswoman OLYMPIA SNOWE and I have introduced legislation, H.R. 567, to extend indefinitely the Alaskan oil export restrictions in their current form.

Today, all 2 million barrels per day of Alaskan North Slope production, representing over 25 percent of total U.S. crude output, is consumed domestically. The goals of maximizing national energy self-reliance and defense preparedness which were the foundation of the original restrictions remain as valid today as when they were adopted in 1973.

The export of Alaskan oil will only further increase U.S. dependence on oil from the unstable Persian Gulf region. With imports accounting for over 40 percent of our current oil consumption, and expected to exceed 50 percent by the early 1990's, it makes little sense to increase the vulnerability of our industrial and military facilities to unpredictable supply disruptions. It also makes little sense to undermine the critical development of a more self-sufficient energy system—especially after the grim lessons taught us by the oil embargo of the late 1970's.

Exports of Alaska's North Slope oil would wipe out much of the U.S.-flag tanker fleet which carries Alaska oil to the lower 48 States and Hawaii. The displacement of the tanker fleet would not only cost an estimated 60,000 to 75,000 jobs, but the loss of trained, active crews in our mercantile fleet would also diminish our long-term defense preparedness. We also would be forced to increase our reliance on foreign-flag tankers to carry imported oil in peacetime and domestic oil in the event of a crisis.

Some have argued that exporting Alaskan oil would improve the U.S. balance of trade. First, any oil exported would require the importation of an equal quantity of foreign oil—with no guarantee that the price would not be higher than our own export rate. Second, any positive impact the oil exports could have upon our trade balance with Japan would be largely cosmetic, masking the continuing inequities in our trading relationship in key manufacturing and agriculture sectors.

Finally, net Federal revenue losses would result if Alaskan oil were to be exported. While exports would increase some Alaskan and Federal tax revenues, these benefits would be more than offset by lower tax revenues from the shipping sector, defaults on federally guaranteed shipping loans, writeoffs on infrastructure investments, and increased ship-related defense spending.

Every aspect of the American economy which depends on, or is affected by, petroleum has benefited from the restrictions on the export of Alaska North Slope crude. I urge my colleagues to join in promoting our national energy and security interests by again reaffirming the congressional determination to prevent the unwise export of Alaskan oil.

WOMEN'S AND MEN'S CAUCUSES FOR CONGRESSMAN ED TOWNS HONORS ROSALIND "ROZ" GALARDI

HON. EDOLPHUS TOWNS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. TOWNS. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, September 24, 1988, the Women's and Men's Caucuses for Congressman Edolphus "Ed" Towns held their annual dinner dance at the Fleur De Lis Restaurant. As part of this annual event, the caucuses chose to honor Rosalind "Roz" Galardi.

Roz was born Rosalind Caslin, in Bensonhurst, Brooklyn of parents who were active in veterans' organizations and the Democratic Party, where her father was a district captain for many years.

Roz, now a resident of Queens, NY, still holds Brooklyn dear to her heart, noting that while you can take a person out of Brooklyn, you can't take Brooklyn out of the person. She is employed by the New York State Liquor Authority, as an investigator for New York City Alcoholic Beverage Council Board.

While a Brooklyn resident, Ms. Galardi resided in East New York's Spring Creek Area, where she raised her two sons, Gary, a carpenter, and Ken, a recent graduate of Syracuse University, holding a degree in chemical engineering. A founder of the Flatlands Heights Civic Association, she served as its secretary for many years. In addition, she was a charter member of Community Planning Board No. 5 in East New York for over 10 years, and served as secretary for two terms of office.

Roz has been a member of the Women's Caucus for Edolphus "Ed" Towns for 4 years, and was journal chairperson for the 1987 annual dinner dance.

Roz is a shining example of the kind of commitment and dedication which serves to better our communities. I am proud to have Roz as a member of the Women's Caucus and I look forward to working with her in the years to come.

TECH-PREP EDUCATION ACT, H.R. 22

HON. WILLIAM D. FORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, on January 3, 1989, I introduced H.R. 22, the Tech-Prep Education Act. It will amend the Carl D. Perkins Vocational Education Act to establish a program of Federal matching grants to consortia of secondary and postsecondary institutions to encourage the implementation of 4-year tech-prep education programs linking the last 2 years of secondary school with the first 2 years of postsecondary education. Such programs are generally known as "two plus two," hence the number of the bill, H.R. 22. Tech-prep education is a combined high school/postsecondary program which, first, leads to a 2-year degree or certificate, second, provides technical preparation in at least one mechanical, engineering, industrial or practical field, third, provides a high level of competence in mathematics, science, and communications, and fourth, leads to job placement.

Our society needs workers well trained in technology and well versed in basic skills if we are to forge a world-class work force for the future. Today, some education or training beyond high school is required for entry into about 50 percent of all job classifications. By the mid-1990's it is predicted that 75 percent of all job classifications will require some postsecondary education. The work force of the future will need large numbers of computer operators and programmers, laboratory technicians, nurses, dental hygienists, paramedics, travel agents, police officers, mechanics, welders, and technicians in areas such as broadcasting, aerospace, electronics, heating, air-conditioning, instrument and appliance repair, robotics and waste treatment. Training for these and many similar occupational specialties is a principal goal of tech-prep education. In addition, those trained in a tech-prep education will also have high level competency in the basic skills of mathematics and communications so that they can continue to learn and to adapt to the rapidly changing workplace of the future.

I would also hope that tech-prep education would make a contribution to alleviating the problems of youth unemployment and high school dropouts.

A recent study indicates that the unemployment rate among 20- to 24-year-olds with less than a high school diploma was 32 percent. The rate for those in the same age group who were high school graduates was 15 percent, while the unemployment rate for those with 1 to 3 years of postsecondary education and those with 4 or more years of postsecondary education were 9 percent and 6 percent respectively. Providing a well structured and integrated program that bridges high school and postsecondary education will open the doors to the job market and to well-paid professional careers for young Americans.

Today, one in four high school students do not complete high school. At that rate, out of approximately 45 million students in elementary and secondary education, 11 million of them will not complete high school. Tech-prep education by providing a richer, more focused, more practical, and more challenging program for many high school youth can play a role in drop out prevention.

The Tech-prep Education Program is aimed primarily at the two middle quartiles academically of the typical high school. It is not designed to replace the existing vocation education programs which provide students completing the 12th grade with entry level job skills. Rather it is intended to broaden vocational education so that students can have available a somewhat more rigorous program that extends from the last 2 years of high school through the first 2 years of postsecondary education. In addition, it is intended to offer an alternative for the many students in the current high school "general education" curriculum. These students very frequently graduate from high school with neither entry level job skills nor a clear path to postsecondary education.

It is important to remember that all those who will be in the work force by the year 2000 are already alive and in school today, and a great skilled worker shortage is approaching unless we act to forestall it. The greatest threat to our future economic security and productivity is unskilled workers. In a recent article titled "Finding Workers to Fill the Jobs," David Broder notes, "Skill shortages, rather than job shortages, are likely to become the dominant labor problem of the future."

For students preparing to pursue a 4-year college degree, the high school college prep curriculum provides in most cases a well functioning bridge designed to give students the coursework needed for college admissions and success. The articulation between secondary and postsecondary technical education is much less well developed. High schools and the providers of postsecondary technical education frequently are operating in isolation from each other. Tech-prep education is designed to bring them together for the benefit of the students and America's future economic needs.

It is imperative that high schools and postsecondary education work together in developing and implementing educational programs that will serve the greatest numbers of young Americans. These are the people who will determine the future economic health of our Nation. These are the people who will keep our airplanes flying, our water flowing, our computers humming, our cars running, our goods and services produced and sold and our laws enforced in a society saturated at every level with technology and information.

I introduced a bill comparable to H.R. 22 in the last Congress and circulated it widely among educators for their comment. I was very gratified by the hundreds of enthusiastic responses. For example, in a recent survey of school board members by the National School Boards Association, nearly 92 percent of the respondents agreed that Federal encouragement for coordinating secondary and postsecondary vocational curricula was desirable. This was the largest consensus in favor of any position regarding Federal vocational education policy. Tech-prep education is an idea that has been developed and tested by educators across the Nation. In several States tech-prep education is being implemented in some areas. Federal support of tech-prep education through H.R. 22 will accelerate and broaden the adoption of this important educational innovation.

I hope that my colleagues will cosponsor H.R. 22. If you would like to cosponsor, please contact Gloria Gray-Watson of my staff at 225–6295.

The text of H.R. 22 follows:

ROD RODENBERGER

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to take note today of the retirement of Ronald J. "Rod" Rodenberger as marshal of the Santa Maria, CA, Judicial District.

Rod has served Santa Barbara County for the past 33 years. He began his career in law enforcement in 1955 as a member of the Santa Barbara County Sheriff's Department. He was on the force of the sheriff's office for 13 years, working out of the Santa Maria substation. The last 6 of those years he was head of the juvenile division. He is a former member of the Juvenile Officers Association of Southern California and was awarded a life membership in the PTA for his work with young people in the community.

Elected marshal of the Santa Maria Judicial District in 1968, he was subsequently reelected to three more successive 6-year terms.

During his tenure as marshal he has labored to upgrade and modernize the marshal's office in northern Santa Barbara County. He secured POST [peace officers standards and training] education for all his officers. He instituted a legal services specialist position into his staff to aid in prompt, cost-effective process service and to free up deputies for more involved duties. This program is a first and a model for more efficient use of tax funds.

He designed and supervised the installation of holding facilities in the county building where prisoners awaiting court appearances can be securely retained. He planned and had installed a security alarm system in all the courts which assures the safety of court personnel and the public.

During his time in office he has served as president and vice president of the Judges, Marshals and Constables Association of the Tri-Counties. He worked 3 years as State director for the Marshals Association of California and has been a member of the finance and legal procedures committee, and the professionalization and training committee of the State Marshals Association as well as serving on the legislative committee of that body. He has, as well, served as chairman of the credentials committee of the Marshals Association. He was treasurer for the State Marshals Executive Council for 4 years.

At present Marshal Rodenberger is on the Law Enforcement Advisory Board for Allan Hancock College. He also serves the community as a commissioner for parks and recreation in the city of Santa Maria.

Before entering law enforcement Rod was a professional baseball player. He was a third baseman for the Reno Silver Sox, a farm club for the-then-New York Giants. After leaving professional sports he played for the Santa Maria Indians semipro baseball team and still holds the all-time batting average record for the team. Playing the full season he posted a 0.508 batting average in the 1955 season. He shared his interest in the game with youngsters in Santa Maria while serving as vice president of the South Side Little League in the late 1960's and early 1970's.

Rod served with the U.S. Army in Korea during that conflict and was involved in extensive action during the fall and winter campaigns of 1951.

Rod and his wife, Phyllis, are the parents of 8 children and grandparents of 11.

Mr. Speaker, I know I speak for the entire community when I say that we are grateful for the service Rod has given to the people of Santa Maria, and on behalf of the U.S. Congress, I want to commend him and wish him well on the occasion of his retirement.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE 1989 CONGRESS-BUNDESTAG STAFF EXCHANGE

HON. E. THOMAS COLEMAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, since 1983 the United States Congress and the West German Parliament, the Bundestag, have conducted an annual exchange program in which staff members from both countries observe and learn about the workings of each other's political constitutions first hand and convey the views of members from both sides on issues faced by both countries. The exchange also provides an opportunity for the development of professional relationships which will be beneficial to both countries over the long term.

This exchange program is one of several sponsored by both public and private institutions in the United States and West Germany to foster better understanding of the institutions and policies of both countries.

This year, eight congressional staff members will visit Germany over the Easter recess period. They will spend about 10 days in Bonn attending meetings conducted by members of the Bundestag, Bundestag staffers, and representatives of political, business, labor, academic, and media institutions. They will spend a weekend in the district of a Bundestag member. The program will conclude with a visit to Berlin during which the delegates will meet with the representatives of the West Berlin Government and United States Government representatives in both West and East Berlin.

A comparable delegation of Bundestag staffers will come to the United States in late June for a 3-week period. They will attend similar meetings here in Washington and will visit the districts of Members of Congress over the Fourth of July recess.

The program is truly a two-way street; accordingly, participants should be experienced Hill staffers so that they can contribute to the success of the exchange on both sides of the Atlantic. The Bundestag sends senior staffers to the United States and a number of high ranking members of the Bundestag take the time to meet with our staffers. The United States has tried to reciprocate.

Therefore, participants should have a demonstrable interest in, if not some direct responsibility for, political, security, trade, or environmental issues as they relate to Europe in general and Germany in particular. In addition, U.S. participants will be expected to help plan and execute the program for the Bundestag staffers when they visit the United States. Among the contributions participants should expect to make the planning and conducting topical meetings for the Bundestag staffers and hosting one or two of the staffers in their Member's district over the Fourth of July.

Applications for participation in the United States delegation will be reviewed initially by the Congressional Staff Group on German-American Affairs; final selection of the delegation will be made by the United States Information Agency.

Senators and Representatives who would like a member of their staff to apply for participation in this year's program should direct them to submit a résumé and cover letter in which they state why they believe that they are qualified and giving some assurance of their ability to participate during the time stated to Bill Inglee, House Foreign Affairs Committee, 808 House Annex 1, by Wednesday, February 15.

EQUAL OPPORTUNITY FOR MEDICAL LICENSURE AND RECIPROCITY ACT OF 1989

HON. JIM BATES

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Equal Opportunity for Medical Licensure and Reciprocity Act of 1989.

This legislation will prohibit discrimination against foreign medical graduates. It would prohibit a State from subjecting a foreign medical graduate who has completed residency training in the United States and who has obtained a license to practice medicine in any State, to any condition or requirement that materially differs from those applied to graduates of U.S. medical schools. The purpose of the legislation is to eliminate the discrimination against medical doctors who have graduated from medical schools outside the United States and Canada. These doctors have repeatedly experienced discrimination in initial licensure, reciprocity, job promotions, hospital privileges, reimbursement, residency, medical staff appointments, and professional society membership. This legislation only applies to medical doctors that are licensed and practicing medicine in the United States.

In the United States today, there are 500,000 practicing physicians, 122,000 of whom are foreign medical graduates [FMG's]. That means that one out of four physicians in this country have received their medical education from outside the United States and Canada. All of the practicing foreign medical graduates are legal residents of the United States and many are naturalized citizens. Nobel prizes have been awarded to several FMG's.

Yet last year a hearing by the House Energy and Commerce Committee's Subcommittee on Health and the Environment revealed that foreign medical graduates are suffering from overt and covert discrimination in licensure, reciprocity, jobs, hospital privileges, promotions, and publications. The subcommittee hearing demonstrated that different standards, different tests, hidden decisions, and outright rejection of approval to practice in a State or to be allowed on a hospital staff are methods which are applied to this group. At my request the General Accounting Office is currently conducting a study of the discrimination which foreign medical graduates face today.

I, and all fairminded Americans oppose discrimination in any form. History tells us that if discrimination is tolerated against any one group, then it can be directed toward any group. This legislation would help to ensure that foreign medical graduates are a part of the best available medical system. Foreign medical graduates are a part of a medical profession that recognizes talent and quality medicine as the primary and constant concern. For this reason, this legislation should have the support of any individual or group that seeks the common ground of excellent health care. This measure seeks to unify the medical profession in a professional way.

The July 1988 Council on Graduate Medical Education report, prepared by the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, recommended that the Federal Government "should not establish policies which would discriminate against medical school graduates on the basis of citizenship, immigration status, or medical school location." It is with that intent that I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

WOMEN'S AND MEN'S CAUCUSES FOR CONGRESSMAN ED TOWNS HONORS WARREN GEORGE MILLER

HON. EDOLPHUS TOWNS

Mr. TOWNS. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, September 24, 1988, the Women's and Men's Caucuses for Congressman EDOLPHUS "ED" TOWNS held their Annual Dinner Dance at the Fleur De Lis Restaurant. As part of this annual event, the caucuses chose to honor Warren George Miller.

HON. FRANK PALLONE, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. PALLONE. Mr. Speaker, one of the many legacies that was left to us by Martin Luther King, Jr., was the sense that caring for one's fellow man is one of the highest callings one can follow. Doctor King literally gave his life in the fight to gain justice and equality for all of our citizens so it is entirely fitting to bring recognition to those who, in the pursuit of their own lives, have dedicated themselves to helping others.

I am pleased to extend that recognition to 38 of my constituents who were honored at the "Keeping the Dream Alive" gala for their contributions to community service. I want to particularly thank the Monmouth County alumnae chapter of Delta Sigma Theta sorority and its president Mrs. Willie F. Robinson for holding the gala which took place at the Eatontown Sheraton.

Those who were honored, their sponsoring organizations, and the roles in which they distinquished themselves are as follows:

CAMPAIGN FINANCE REFORM

HON. NICHOLAS MAVROULES

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. MAVROULES. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be an original cosponsor of H.R. 14, a comprehensive and necessary campaign finance reform package. I hail my colleagues, Congressmen COELHO, SYNAR, and LEACH for their leadership in introducing this legislation that will modify and reform our present system of congressional campaign financing.

In my judgment, campaign reform is necessary if we are to achieve the ultimate goal of restoring public confidence in our electoral process. In order to do so, I believe that any campaign reform bill passed by the Congress must, first and foremost, achieve two important objectives. It must increase the influence of the individual voter in each congressional district, and it must lessen Congress' dependence on Political Action Committee contributions.

Shockingly, campaign spending for congressional campaigns increased from $60.9 million in 1975–76 to more than $194 million in 1985–86. This whopping increase in campaign cost should be and is a bipartisan concern. Besides being a shameful waste of resources, this level of expense forces members to spend, large amounts of their time fundraising; time often better used addressing the needs of the Nation.

This proposal effectively addresses my areas of concern. The legislation reduces the role, and therefore influence, of political action committees, it places reasonable limits on campaign spending, and it allows greater participation of individual voters. This bill limits, for the first time, the total PAC contributions a House candidate can receive and establishes spending limits and a matching public funding system.

The Coelho-Synar-Leach bill contains two major provisions that move toward these goals. Regarding greater individual voter participation, candidates must demonstrate local involvement by raising 10 percent of the spending limit from individuals, 80 percent of which must be contributed from home State residents in amounts of $250 or less. As recently as 1974, small individual contributions represented 50 percent of the total contributed to House candidates. However, by 1986 small contributions amounted to only 15 percent of the total. This section will return thousands of small contributors to the electoral process.

Since 1977, political action committee contributions to House candidates have increased from $15 to $82 million. According to Common Cause, winning House candidates received 45 percent of their contributions from PAC's; it appears that we are moving quickly toward a time when a majority of members will receive more than half of their contributions from PAC's. H.R. 14 will ensure that those candidates who qualify for matching funds receive no more than $100,000 per 2-year election cycle from PAC's.

Another important provision of H.R. 14 will voluntarily cap campaign spending. Those candidates who agree to a spending limit of $400,000 become eligible for partial matching funds in the general election. The bill also contains other reforms dealing with independent expenditures, negative advertising, the amount of personal funds which a candidate may contribute, and other enforcement issues.

Mr. Speaker, as I have said before, when our Founding Fathers designed our constitutional government some 200 years ago, they envisioned a bicameral legislature which was accountable and responsive to the American people. The high cost of campaigns and our present method of financing them has raised serious doubts as to whether our present system is meeting those lofty goals. If we fail to seize this unique opportunity we may ultimately run the risk of losing the confidence of a vast majority of the electorate.

Most of us can well remember the circumstances surrounding the passage of the Presidential Elections Campaign Act more than a decade ago. I am confident that the lessons gained from that experience will allow us to work together in a bipartisan manner to bring about a new system which is fair and open to everyone; a system not unlike the one envisioned 200 years ago.

HONORING LOU ELLA WALLING

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, today in my home town of Riverside, Lou Ella Walling will be honored as the 1989 Soroptimist Gold Key Award winner. I would like to pause for a moment and recognize this valuable member of our community.

Each year, the Soroptimists honor a person that exemplifies the spirit of voluntarism. It is plain to see why Lou Ella Walling has been chosen for the 1989 award. She has been an active volunteer in the areas of cultural arts, children, the handicapped, and women's organizations for over 20 years. As part of her service, she has presided as president of the Riverside Imperial Epilepsy Society, the Victoria Garden Club, the California Federation of Women's Clubs, the Visiting Nurses Association, and the Riverside Woman's Club.

Our Nation is enhanced because volunteers willingly work to improve the lives of innumerable individuals, to make communities more beautiful, to make art more accessible to everyone, and in general, to improve the lives of each and every one of us. We in Riverside have been especially blessed because Lou Ella Walling has served her community so well. She is especially deserving of the Soroptimist's Gold Key Award and I am sure my colleagues will join with me in recognizing her here today.

TRIBUTE TO BROTHER BOOKER T. ASHE

HON. JIM MOODY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, I am privileged to honor Brother Booker T. Ashe for 25 years of service to the Milwaukee community.

As director of the House Peace Community Center, Brother Ashe has provided a sanctuary for the sick, the impoverished, the hungry, and the desperate. He provides the support, concern, and understanding that is absent from the lives of those who seek assistance.

All too often, caring and compassionate people sit idle, perhaps feeling that their individual efforts would have little effect on the problems facing our country. Brother Ashe demonstrates the tremendous good that one man, intolerant of cruelty and suffering, can accomplish.

Brother Ashe entered the Capuchin Order in June 1951 and has dedicated his life to helping others through a variety of activities and organizations. He has served as president of the National Black Clergy Caucus and was a member of the board of directors of the National Office for Black Catholics. He was also a member of the board of the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice and he served on the board of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Locally, Brother Ashe is a past chairperson of the Milwaukee Commission on Community Relations. He has also served on the Milwaukee Council on Alcoholism, the Volunteer Action Center, the Board of Directors of Catholic Social Services, and many other worthwhile and vital community groups. His endless energy and dedication inspire all of us to remember those less fortunate and to work to end the pain and suffering they endure.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to honor Brother Booker T. Ashe for his unselfish service to Milwaukee and our country.

HAPPY 100TH BIRTHDAY MRS. KALINOWSKI

HON. PATRICIA SCHROEDER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, Caroline Kalinowski will be 100 years old today and I want to wish her a very special happy birthday.

Mrs. Kalinowski came to the United States from Poland when she was 16. She married

Martin Kalinowski, a coal miner in Pennsylvania, and when he died in 1926, she had the responsibility of raising four young children. She also taught herself to read and write English, and worked in the garment industry in Brooklyn until she was 72 years old.

Mrs. Kalinowski, who now lives in Denver, has five grandchildren and five great-grandchildren.

Happy birthday Mrs. Kalinowski.

ROE VERSUS WADE

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, January 22, 1989, marked the 16th anniversary of the historic Supreme Court decision in Roe versus Wade affirming a woman's constitutional right to choose to have an abortion under certain circumstances. Every year since 1973, polls have indicated that the majority of Americans have continued to support this landmark ruling.

With this month's Supreme Court decision to examine a Missouri abortion statute, however, a very vocal minority has stepped up its attacks on the Roe versus Wade ruling. As the Court could use the Missouri case to reconsider Roe versus Wade, now is an especially crucial time for us to reaffirm our commitment to the fundamental right to choose to have an abortion. As Members of Congress, it is our responsibility to protect the rights of the people, no matter how outspoken the opponents may be.

Abortion is legal, and must remain legal.

It is estimated that prior to 1973, hundreds of thousands of women a year were forced to rely upon abortions that put their health and lives at risk. Hundreds of women died annually as a result of botched abortions, and thousands of women suffered permanent disability as a consequence of failed abortions in their homes and on the network of back-alley abortionists. I saw the results of this butchery as a young prosecutor in New York charged with investigating and prosecuting those performing illegal abortions.

We must never return to such a perilous, potentially lethal situation. The Roe versus Wade ruling allowed women to make the very difficult and personal decision to end unwanted pregnancy without risking prosecution, mutilation, or death.

Over the course of the past 16 years, Congress has faltered in its duty to protect the rights set forth in the Roe versus Wade ruling by passing measures that have denied certain women their constitutional right to choose to have an abortion. Our Government is currently straddled with an abortion policy that discriminates against poor women, women in the Armed Forces, military dependents and retirees, women incarcerated in Federal prisons, Peace Corps volunteers, residents of the District of Columbia, and Native American women who receive their medical care through the Indian Health Service.

The commencement of a new administration and a new Congress marks an ideal time to begin remedying the tragedy of this discriminatory policy. As we commemorate Roe versus Wade, we must pledge to guarantee safe and accessible abortion services to the poor as well as the rich. And as we face potential Supreme Court reconsideration of the ruling, we must unite and demonstrate our strong commitment to maintaining right to choose for all women.

LONNIE M. NELMS: A DEDICATED PUBLIC SERVANT RETIRES

HON. G.V. (SONNY) MONTGOMERY

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, outstanding public service should not go unheralded. It is, therefore, my pleasure to share with my colleagues a glimpse of the career of a dedicated Federal worker whose service to his country has spanned more than three decades.

On December 3, 1988, Mr. Lonnie M. Nelms of Corinth, MS, retired as Director of the Corinth National Cemetery, a post he assumed in August 1981. Almost 6,500 veterans and family members are interred in this picturesque, beautifully-manicured 20-acre cemetery.

Since 1958, Mr. Nelms has held a series of positions throughout the South in the Veterans' Administration's National Cemetery System, which consists of 113 cemeteries in 38 States and Puerto Rico. For his compassionate and dedicated service in behalf of our Nation's deceased veterans and their families, he has been recognized by the VA's Chief Memorial Affairs Director with the Department of Memorial Affairs' Oustanding Career Award.

Mr. Nelms is an Army veteran who served from 1954 to 1956 in France and Germany.

Mr. Speaker, I know my colleagues will want to join with me in congratulating Mr. Nelms for the high caliber and longevity of his government service and in conveying our best wishes for a healthy, happy retirement.

REPEAL OF SECTION 89 EMPLOYEE BENEFIT RULES

HON. JOHN J. LaFALCE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. LaFALCE. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of myself and 34 of our colleagues, I am introducing legislation today to repeal section 89 of the Tax Code relating to employee benefit plans. Section 89, which was enacted as part of the Tax Reform Act of 1986, is intended to ensure that employer-sponsored benefit plans are fairly distributed among all employees, regardless of salary level.

I want to emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that we fully support the intent of section 89 and applaud its ultimate goal of encouraging employers to expand health insurance coverage among the working uninsured. But we are concerned that the new law, which took effect Janaury 1, is so complicated and the compliance burden so costly that it may well have the opposite effect.

Section 89 requires all employers to conduct a series of complex statistical tests to determine if their employee benefit plans, principally health and life insurance, are distributed fairly between highly paid and rank-and-file employees.

Business owners will face costly data-gathering requirements and complicated valuation rules to measure the eligibility and benefit provisions of each of their benefit plans. If a benefit plan fails the statistical tests required by section 89, highly paid employees would be taxed on the value of the excess benefits they receive. And if a business fails to report to IRS the amount of excess benefits provided to employees, the employer will also face tax penalties.

Mr. Speaker, section 89 is so complex that the Treasury Department has yet to issue regulations implementing the new law. Last year's Technical Corrections Act imposed a deadline of November 15, 1988, but still no regulations have been issued to provide definitions and guidance to employers.

The extreme complexity of section 89's benefits testing requirements, the costly administrative burden it imposes, and the lack of any formal guidance from Treasury makes it very difficult, if not impossible, for employers to comply with the law.

The compliance burden will fall particularly hard on small businesses because of their heavy reliance on part-time workers and their high rates of employee turnover, and because they simply cannot afford the costs of hiring outside consultants.

As a result, section 89 will likely have an adverse impact on the expansion of health insurance coverage. Those firms that do not now offer health benefits will be futher discouraged from doing so, and those that do provide health plans may be inclined to reduce their benefits or terminate their plans altogether.

It is for these reasons that I am introducing legislation to repeal section 89. Repeal of the law will give Congress an opportunity to review the potential impact on employers and to examine reasonable, simplified alternatives to achieve the policy goals of assuring fair distribution of employee benefits and reducing the ranks of the uninsured.

A TRIBUTE TO REV. D.B. WALKER

HON. BUTLER DERRICK

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize a truly special man, Rev. D.B. Walker of Honea Path, SC.

On January 14, Reverend Walker was honored by his Liberty Baptist Church family for 40 years of faithful, sincere, and efficient ministry.

Born in Anderson County, SC, D.B. Walker attended Anderson County public schools. He graduated from Benedict College in Columbia, SC, received a masters degree in education from A&T University in Greensboro, NC, and was a public school teacher for 26 years. An honorably discharged veteran of World War II, he served much of his time in uniform overseas. He is married to the former Amanda McPhail and they are the parents of two daughters.

As a teacher and now a minister, D.B. Walker has inspired and touched countless lives. I believe a poem on "Greatness" by C.E. Flynn that was included in the tribute's souvenir bulletin states it best:

"A man is as great as the dreams he dreams,
As great as the love he bears;
"As great as the values he redeems,
And the happiness he shares.
"A man is as great as the thoughts he thinks,
As the worth he has attained;
"As the fountains at which his spirit drinks,
And the insight he has gained.
"A man is as great as the truth he speaks,
As great as the help he gives;
"As great as the destiny he seeks,
As great as the life he lives."

Please join me, Mr. Speaker, in congratulating a great man— Rev. D.B. Walker—for four decades of spiritual guidance to his Honea Path congregation. He has my heartfelt thanks for his contributions to the community. And I want to wish him God's continued blessings.

A TRIBUTE TO TIMOTHY PATRICK FURLONG

HON. NANCY PELOSI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Ms. PELOSI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in memory of Timothy Patrick Furlong. A native of Dallas, TX, and a resident of Washington, DC, Tim Furlong was an attorney, an activist and fundraiser in the Democratic Party. He was a long-time aide and political associate of U.S. Senator LLOYD BENTSEN. Tim served as a cochairman of the 1988 Washington Gala for the Dukakis-Bentsen Presidential campaign.

Because of Tim's love of politics and knowledge of history and the political process, he was able to provide counsel and assistance to a wide range of elected officials, political candidates and causes. He was a tenacious fighter for what he believed—yet always gracious and dignified in victory or defeat. As a leading lobbyist on Capitol Hill, Tim was well known to Members of Congress and political leaders nationwide where he helped to achieve legislative solutions to a range of public policy problems. Tim earned a reputation for his substantive approach, political savvy and honesty.

A founding partner in the Washington, DC law firm of McAuliffe, Kelly, Furlong, Aldrich & Siemens, he was a former partner in the California and Washington law firm of Manatt, Phelps, Rothenberg & Evans.

Tim loved running, bicycling, football, reading and travel and was a connoisseur of fine wines and foods. His generosity and helping hand were shared by all. He pursued quality in all his endeavors and, above all, in his relationships with his family and friends.

He is survived by his parents, Pat and Katy Furlong; his brother and sister-in-law, Dennis and Dede Furlong; two nieces, Shea and Maggie Furlong; many aunts, uncles and cousins and countless friends across the country. Tim's older brother Michael passed away in March 1988.

Tim was a wonderful friend to each and every one of us. His zest for life, his love and his thoughtfulness will continue to be a very special part of our lives.

OUTSTANDING CITIZENS OF BEAVER COUNTY, PA

HON. JOE KOLTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. KOLTER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor two truly outstanding citizens of Beaver County, PA, in my Fourth Congressional District.

The Upper Beaver Valley Jaycees have chosen Joseph Sabella of New Brighton as "Man of the Year," and Dr. Betty Steege of Beaver as "Woman of the Year." Both are to be honored at a distinguished service awards ceremony.

Mr. Sabella, a graduate of New Brighton High School, my alma mater, has served the Jaycees in many fine capacities, including that of JCI senator. His achievements have also been exemplified in various Fourth District community organizations, especially in the area of advocacy for the handicapped. Joe Sabella is certainly a living example of the leadership abilities cherished by the Jaycees.

Dr. Steege is recognized and applauded for her tremendous efforts with Beaver Valley service organizations. Her many years of volunteering have greatly benefited local communities. Betty's significant contributions to local business, education and community development have left a positive lasting impression with area citizens. Her tradition of service, in fact, continues as she begins her term as the first woman president of the United Way of Beaver County.

I rise today to ask my colleagues to join me in congratulating Joseph Sabella and Betty Steege upon their reception of the distinguished service award, and I also commend the Upper Beaver Valley Jaycees for the distinction of conducting the longest continuously run project in the history of the Pennsylvania Jaycees organization.

THE OUTLOOK FOR REFUSENIKS IS MIXED

HON. JAMES McCLURE CLARKE

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. Speaker, as we begin the work of a new Congress, let us not forget a continuing problem: the denial by the Soviet Government of the right of free emigration. Although many have been released in recent months, the problem is by no means solved.

Let me focus on two refusenik families who illustrate the two sides of the situation.

After many years of waiting, Yuly Kosharovsky has finally been told that he can emigrate. Like many others, he kept faith during the grim years when only a few hundred were allowed to leave each year, when harassment and economic hardship were the predictable results of applying for permission to leave. Despite the risks, Yuly learned Hebrew and became a Hebrew teacher, an activity the Soviet authorities tried by threats and intimidation to discourage. As other veteran refuseniks have been allowed to leave in recent years, Yuly has stepped forward as a spokesman and champion of the many who remained. Articulate and persuasive in English as well as Russian, Yuly did much to keep world attention directed to this continuing injustice. Now, at last, after years of waiting while his beard began turning grey, Yuly Kosharovsky and his family have been told they are free to go.

The Igor Uspensky family illustrates the other side of the situation. They are victims of an unfair and arbitrary Soviet policy that bans emigration of persons in possession of state secrets. There are two problems with that policy. One is that the definition of state secrets is so broad that persons who worked as language teachers and meatcutters have been denied exit permission on the ground of state secrecy. The second problem is that despite President Gorbachev's promise to put a time limit of 5 years on the use of that rule after the end of access to secrets, no limit appears to be in effect. Igor Uspensky and his wife Inessa have been denied repeatedly on secrecy grounds since 1979, most recently in November of last year. Their son Slava, who has never had access to secrets, applied separately and was turned down as well. The Uspensky family has suffered enough. The Soviet Government should let them go.

Mr. Speaker, the Soviet Union has signed international agreements recognizing the right of free emigration. They are therefore under obligation to dismantle their emigration procedures and let people leave who want to do so, except those under prosecution for legitimate crimes. At the very least, the Soviet authorities should put a time limit on secrecy refusals, end the ability of relatives to block emigration, and cancel the pointless requirement that emigrants be invited to go abroad by a close relative already there. This Congress will not be satisfied while those steps remain to be taken.

THE DEDICATED SERVICE OF THE SIMMONS FAMILY

HON. CONSTANCE A. MORELLA

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mrs. MORELLA. Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw your attention to the family of Gary and Brenda Simmons of Cabin John, MD. This unique family has provided years of dedicated service to the people of Montgomery County, MD. In fact, every Simmons over 16 years of age has served in the fire/rescue service in Montgomery County.

Gary is a volunteer assistant chief for the Cabin John Park Volunteer Fire Department, and was formerly a paid firefighter for the Bethesda Fire Department. For many years, Brenda has been the official photographer for both the CJPVFD and the Bethesda-Chevy Chase Rescue Squad. Gary and Brenda's children, Wade and Erica, have served with both Cabin John and Glen Echo Fire Departments as volunteer firefighters and ambulance technicians since first becoming eligible at 16, and Gary and Brenda's youngest son Justin will soon be old enough to follow suit.

I am sad to report that the Simmons' will soon be moving from Maryland's Eighth Congressional District to Georgia's First. Although the citizens of Montgomery County will no longer have the fine services of the Simmons family, I understand that the newest constituents of my colleague, LINDSAY THOMAS, are planning to join a volunteer fire department near Savannah. Although I have lost a real community asset, I would like to thank the Simmons' for their service and to wish them the best of luck in Georgia.

A TRIBUTE TO FLOYD AND LYNN HALL

HON. CARROLL HUBBARD, JR.

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, I want to pay tribute today to a wonderful couple, Floyd Benjamin Hall and Pearl Lynn McCormick Hall, who reside in Metropolis, IL.

Both Mr. and Mrs. Hall are ill and have spent many weeks at Western Baptist Hospital in Paducah, KY.

Their talented daughter, Joyce Lynn Hall Hubbard, has been in western Kentucky and Metropolis the past several weeks, assisting her parents.

The many relatives and friends of Floyd and Lynn Hall are aware of the many accomplishments of this couple for their community, for their church—Metropolis' First Baptist Church—and for countless people in western Kentucky and southern Illinois.

Among those specially helped by this beloved couple was this Member of Congress. In 1967 Floyd and Lynn Hall greatly assisted me—at age 29—in defeating an 8-year incumbent for the office of State senator from Kentucky's First District.

The main reason they supported Carroll Hubbard for State senator in 1967 was that I had married their only child, Joyce Lynn Hall, on August 20, 1966.

Floyd and Lynn Hall were also very helpful to this Member of Congress when I was reelected State senator in 1971.

In 1974, Floyd and Lynn Hall were very helpful to their son-in-law when I was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives, defeating a 16-year incumbent in the Democratic Party primary election.

They have been of tremendous help to me through the years.

I admire their efforts to win the battle now against serious illnesses which currently caused physical weakness and dependency.

Three Kentuckians of whom Floyd and Lynn Hall are understandably very proud are their daughter Joyce and their only grandchildren—Kelly Lynn Hubbard, a 19-year-old sophomore at Duke University in Durham, NC, and Krista Leigh Hubbard, a 15-year-old sophomore at Langley High School in McLean, VA. Krista would probably appreciate it being mentioned that she will be 16 on Wednesday of next week—February 1.

Naturally, those of us who know, love, and appreciate Lynn and Floyd Hall wish for them a speedy, complete recovery. Our prayer is that God will richly bless them now and always.

HON. BOB CARR

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. CARR. Mr. Speaker, I rise to recognize a remarkable individual, Roland Ledebuhr, for receiving the National Association of Realtors, National Distinguished Service Award. I am honored to serve as his Representative in Congress.

This is an honor awarded to those few members who have served with great distinction for years at all levels of organized real estate.

Roland Ledebuhr captures the essence of the Distinguished Service Award through his uncompromising high ethical standards. His life's basic principle of living by the Golden Rule, a concept on which our own code of ethics is founded, is evident in his many accomplishments.

Roland has always been a pillar of strength for the realtors. The leadership posts he has held in the local, State, and national associations are many and broad based. he has held positions of importance and great responsibility, and he has excelled in the execution of his duties, thereby solidifying the level of respect which realtors continue to hold for him.

Roland has been instrumental in steering the National Association of Realtors, the Nation's largest trade and professional association which represents nearly 800,000 members involved in all aspects of the real estate profession. He continues to serve his fellow realtors unselfishly, giving of his time and good counsel.

HONORING VELMA NOONAN

HON. DOUG WALGREN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Speaker, it is with pride that I rise today to honor a most distinguished constituent and friend of mine, Velma Noonan. Velma is retiring from United Mental Health, Inc., where she has been instrumental in building a strong grass-roots mental health coalition of consumers, families, advocates, and providers. Velma has not only led that coalition in improving services and supports for mentally ill persons, but has also been a valuable resource for those of us responsible for Government policy. Velma Noonan has worked tirelessly to build a better world without seeking public attention and recognition.

Although Velma is retiring, I have no doubt that her involvement will continue to serve as a fine example for those of us who care about the community in which we live.

Mr. Speaker, I ask you and my colleagues to join with me in recognizing Velma Noonan and commemorating her services to the mental health community.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. McMILLEN of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay special tribute to a member of my community who, through her uncompromising dedication to the preservation of historic Annapolis, has created a living monument for her fellow Marylanders and the Nation. Mary Pringle Symonds has served unselfishly for over 25 years as a volunteer, commissioner, and president of Historic Annapolis, Inc.; a model organization blending corporate and private sector commitment to the preservation of historic Annapolis.

Mrs. Symonds began her work in Annapolis in 1963 as a volunteer for the Historic District Commission. She spent many long hours generating interest in the pre-Revolutionary seaport of Annapolis which had once served briefly as the capital of the newly formed United States. From 1969 to 1977, Mrs. Symonds served as the first president of the Annapolis Historic District Commission. It was under her leadership that the William Paca House (circa 1765) was restored for the 1976 Bicentennial celebration.

In 1977, Mrs. Symonds became president of Historic Annapolis, Inc. It was in this position that she was most able to promote the historic preservation of Annapolis through local, county and State channels. As Mrs. Symonds retires from her 10-year term as president of Historic Annapolis, Inc., she leaves a cultural legacy to all those fortunate enough to visit the National Historic Landmark of Annapolis.

Although I regret Mrs. Symonds' retirement, I am heartened by the fact that she will continue to serve on the board of Historic Annapolis, Inc. I am proud to offer my congratulations to Mrs. Symonds and extend my best wishes to her. I am sure that my colleagues will be pleased to join me in this much deserved salute to Mrs. Symonds and her work.

A TRIBUTE TO EUGENE ENDRES

HON. DOUGLAS APPLEGATE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. APPLEGATE. Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to bring to the attention of my colleagues in the U.S. House of Representatives and to the American public the induction of Mr. Eugene Endres of New Philadelphia, OH, as an honorary member of the Tuscarawas County Chamber of Commerce. This is, indeed, an honor as only one other person has this distinction.

Born in New Philadelphia, OH, in 1917, Gene has remained in his hometown throughout his life dedicating it to his family, friends, and his profession. His chosen field of a florist began some 53 years ago when he entered the family business in New Philadelphia and of which he served as president for the past 37 years until his retirement last year. It was in this capacity that Gene's reputation as a rose grower became known throughout the floral industry in both this country and in others. He has traveled extensively, always promoting the floral industry, with particular emphasis on the rose, and Tuscarawas County.

Because of his contributions to the industry, Gene has been honored many times by many different groups including the Ohio Agricultural Society and the American Floricultural Society which inducted him into their hall of fame. He also has served as president of Roses, Inc.

Those who know Gene Endres are well aware of his lifetime contributions outside of his profession, as well. Dedicated to the Tuscarawas County area, Gene never misses the opportunity to tout the virtues of the area and all that it has to offer. He has contributed much to the development of the New Philadelphia area by his generous offering of his personal time and resources. Those outside his county who know of it probably have heard about it from Gene.

This most recent honor of confirming upon Gene Endres an honorary membership of the Tuscarawas County Chamber of Commerce is a fitting tribute to a man that has contributed so much.

Mr. Speaker, I am very fortunate to be the representative of an area that has as one of its residents a man like Gene Endres. He is one of which many of us are proud for what he has accomplished and who I am proud to call a friend.

VIOLET ELEMENTARY SCHOOL DEDICATES NEW LEARNING CENTER

HON. DAVID E. BONIOR

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. BONIOR. Mr. Speaker, it is my honor to announce that on February 2, 1989, the Violet Elementary School in St. Clair Shores, MI, will dedicate a new learning center to its former principal of 15 years and a good friend of mine, Ms. Elvira T. Hauslein.

As the first principal of Violet elementary in 1960, Ms. Hauslein helped establish and maintain an innovative curriculum for her students. She initiated an outdoor camping program, coordinated a school-to-school project with an elementary school in Israel, and created an international exchange with another elementary school in Godrich, ON, Canada. She also served on the State curriculum committee for health, physical education, and recreation from 1959–61.

The scope of the curriculum she administered at Violet elementary was not confined to regional and international interests. Her knowledge of the aerospace field brought the entire universe to her students. After witnessing the launch of Apollo 17—the only night launch of the Apollo program—Ms. Hauslein brought back souvenirs to her students, enabling them to share the experience as well.

Ms. Hauslein took an active role in aerospace education during a time when our Nation was just beginning to explore beyond our atmosphere with manned flights. She was a member of the Michigan aerospace education curriculum committee, the Air Force Association, the Civil Air Patrol's aerospace education division, and the National Aerospace Education Council. From 1961–62, she served as the Michigan Education Association's assistant program chairperson for aerospace education and later as the group's chairperson.

Her dedication to education found her serving as a representative to the Macomb County radio council. From 1960–62, she arranged programs to tell the story of education to radio listeners across Macomb County.

It is in recognition of the spirit Ms. Hauslein brought to education that the Hauslein Learning Center will continue to satisfy the curiosity of young boys and girls who are fortunate to attend Violet Elementary School.

HON. M. EUGENIA CHARLES, PRIME MINISTER OF DOMINICA, SPEAKS TO THE FUTURE MIAMI CONFERENCE ON THE CARIBBEAN

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 24, 1989

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I recently attended the Conference on Central America and the Caribbean which is held each year in Miami, FL. This annual conference brings together political and governmental leaders from Central America and the Caribbean with officials of the American Government, representatives from Congress, academic experts on the area, and a wide variety of business and corporate representatives who are interested in helping with economic development in the region. The conference has grown in importance over the years and is now regarded as one of the most important forums for multilateral contacts in the region.

At the closing banquet of this outstanding conference, the Honorable M. Eugenia Charles, the Prime Minister of Dominica, delivered an inspiring speech which I believe should be of interest to the Congress and to the public.

ADDRESS BY M. EUGENIA CHARLES, PRIME MINISTER OF DOMINICA, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1988, MIAMI CONFERENCE ON THE CARIBBEAN

Honorable heads of government, Dr. West, other distinguished guests, ladies and gentleman. Earlier today, I proposed that we look backward.

Now, it is time to look forward. It is time to spread on the record a message from this Conference to those who will be trying to respond to Caribbean Basin concerns over the coming year.

As our chairman this noon, Mr. Brooks, noted, I have been coming to many of these Conferences, and they are not all alike. In every year, of course, they represent an opportunity for doing business, and the informal networking is reinforced by program sessions that cast light on some of the problems and opportunities pertaining to the various most promising areas of business.

But on the policy side, Miami Conferences do differ year to year. Sometimes, when new initiatives have emanated from Washington or great decisions hang in the balance in Congress, the Conference has provided a platform for U.S. policymakers to display their wares, so to speak, for the benefit of the Caribbean consumer. It is an opportunity to educate the business and government leaders in the Caribbean, or in Central America, on the details and purposes of external policies that affect them. This is true not only of U.S. policy—though it does tend to affect us in the region most of all—but of other industrialized trading partners and aid providers which have sent high-level officials to this Conference.

Sometimes, however, especially when there is a hiatus in U.S. policy during a change of Administration, the Caribbean Basin comes out from under the shadow of great-power policymaking, and the spotlight is able to fall upon our own vision of our future.

This is one of those years.

As in 1980, this Conference offers a special opportunity for the leaders of the Caribbean Basin to challenge the incoming U.S. Administration with a call for action on a Caribbean agenda according to our own priorities. We know that President-elect Bush—who has twice participated in the Miami Conference in years past—is no stranger to the concerns of our region. Our hopes are high that the spirit of the CBI will carry forward unabated, and indeed that we will experience a rebirth of enthusiasm in the effort to make the CBI even stronger and more effective.

But it would be unfair to expect Mr. Bush to step forward at this time with a blueprint for Caribbean Basin policy in the new Administration. It is more appropriate for us to lead the way, by examining the issues among ourselves, and pointing out what needs to be done.

We have had a busy week, with very substantive programs in the individual session, and a long day of policy dialogue today. Those of us who had the stimulating experience of participating in this afternoon's "policy forum" now understand why Peter Johnson has been describing this session all along as sort of a Phil Donahue Show with Dante Fascell as the Phil Donahue.

Well, as I lay no claim to the talents of a Donahue—or a Fascell—I promise tonight to be mercifully brief.

There are basically two messages I would like to leave you with. The first is addressed to those outside our region. It is a message of what the people of the Caribbean Basin need and expect from those who claim to care for us and for our future. The second is addressed to ourselves—the public and private-sector leaders of the Caribbean and Central America.

First, the outside message.

We all know the issues—more trade access, better incentives to attract investors, getting more mileage out of tourism, getting the financial aid needed for infrastructural and human resource development. These are issues that affect all our trading partners and aid providers—the British, the Europeans, the Canadians, the Taiwanese, now potentially the Japanese and others—in addition to the Americans. But giving due regard to where and when we are meeting, I would like to target a few recommendations directly at Mr. Bush and members of the incoming 101st U.S. Congress.

In respect to trade, we are counting on the improved market access promised to be forthcoming in CBI-II. I am encouraged to have heard this week that the legislation will be resubmitted immediately and action could come as early as April. I can only say that it is time for the dragging of feet to stop and the Caribbean agenda to be moved to the top of the pile. For the last two years we have been hearing that there is great support for a bill to boost the CBI—if the trade bill all gets done first, and if the tax bill all gets done first, if the Canada treaty gets done first. One can't help thinking of the Caribbean as cast in the role of Cinderella, who gets to go to the ball if the scrubbing and washing is done and she finds something suitable to wear. It's time to send the message that the countries of the Caribbean have been the forgotten stepchild long enough.

During the past year we in the Caribbean and Central America have had many opportunities to express our views on the CBI-II legislation, and I believe there is broad consensus behind the Gibbons Bill. In my view, if the Congress really wants to help the Caribbean, it must be willing to look again at the exclusion of textiles and leather goods. There must be a willingness to look at quantity, and to realize that the level of exports from CBI countries to the U.S. market is simply not going to hurt U.S. producers.

Aside from new legislation, however, much can be done to improve access to the U.S. market. Many of the obstacles we face are procedural ones, from Customs regulations, agricultural regulations, or other bureaucratic hurdles. None of us is suggesting that the United States relax its standards or do anything that would bring harm to the U.S. population, like admitting fruit with fruitflies. But we have to ask which of all these regulations serve a real purpose, and which are merely hangovers from the past which no one has looked at recently. And it's not too late to implement one idea that had come out early on in the CBI discussions—putting U.S. agriculture inspectors on-site in the CBI countries so that if perishable products are going to be rejected, it happens before rather than after someone pays to ship them to Miami.

Market access, however, is still not enough. It must be complemented—as the original CBI contemplated—with investment incentives. The fact today is that we in the Caribbean welcome investors and give them every encouragement, knowing their plants will mean jobs and foreign exchange earnings. But they don't get any corresponding incentive from the United States. The next Congress would do well to consider restoring the concept of the investment tax credit.

At the same time, it is critically important that Congress leave in place the only existing program that offers an incentive to investors—Puerto Rico's 936 program. I know that many have expressed frustration over the flow of funds from the 936 initiative, and it is extremely important that any remaining bureaucratic obstacles, whether on the part of the U.S. Treasury or of Puerto Rico, be put aside. I would like to note, however, that Dominica has in fact already benefited from this program, and I would encourage others to explore it more creatively. I might add that I myself fail to see what is regarded by many in the region as so objectionable about signing Tax Information Exchange Agreements. Dominica has a TIEA in effect, and I foresee no possible harm that will come to us on that account.

The 936 program at its full potential could provide the tool we need to recapture the interest of the U.S. private sector. For a while, after the launching of the CBI by President Reagan, there was a spurt of high interest by U.S. corporations in exploring the region, but the level of interest needed to really make the CBI concept work has not continued. We need to bring it back.

The original CBI had three components—trade, aid and investment. Like the missing investment component, the aid component was indispensible. Foreign assistance—at meaningful levels and disbursed in an effective manner—must still be seen as an essential part of U.S. policy toward the Caribbean Basin.

This afternoon Congressman Fascell told us that for all practical purposes the Caribbean Basin wouldn't be getting any more U.S. aid, the victim of the U.S. budget squeeze and the earmarking of funds for other parts of the world. We are supposed to accept this as part of political reality.

Well, it is not acceptable. The importance of peace and democracy in the nations surrounding the United States to the security of the United States is part of political reality. The dependence of Caribbean democracy on the ability of our nations to meet the economic needs of our people is part of political reality—for us as elected Caribbean leaders, and, yes, for the United States of America.

For the less developed islands of the Caribbean, particularly, the breaking down of tariff barriers will avail us little if we cannot get the assistance we need to develop our infrastructure and our human resources.

Development assistance, after all, is not money down a rat hole, as many persons apparently believe. Nor are the Caribbean economies the basket cases they were once taken for, even a few years ago. Thanks in part to the CBI and the aid that accompanied it, our finances are now in better shape. Most countries of the region are showing growth in every sector—industry, agriculture and tourism. It is penny wise and pound foolish to deny the modest help that can make us truly self-supporting just a few years over the horizon.

An effective aid program also has as much to do with the way money is spent as with the total amount allocated. I often feel that a small package of money given to us directly, with full accountability in how it is spent, would go a long way further than the same money given to outside contractors and consultants to implement projects for us.

I also feel that something is amiss in the allocation of funds among aid recipients worldwide. While it is important to help the poorest of the poor, it is also important to help those who are also poor but are making a real effort to get out of poverty, and have a real prospect for doing so. The per-capita income test as applied to the small countries of the Caribbean totally obscures their genuine development needs, and should be done away with.

Another aspect of U.S.-Caribbean relations that cannot be emphasized enough is the ongoing process of consultation. Earlier today I applauded the extensive consultation process that produced the CBI. And this Miami Conference forum itself illustrates the great value of coming together for dialogue, both among the countries of the region and with the U.S. and other developed nations.

But consultation must be an ongoing process. Three days a year at the Miami Conference are not enough. Initial discussions leading to new legislation two or three times a decade are not enough. The type of hearings and dialogue that have taken place today should be going on not just at international meetings but within our countries as well.

I would like to emphasize, however, the importance of listening to the right people. It is most unfortunate and counterproductive when meetings are called and persons are invited to speak on behalf of the region who do not in fact represent either the grass-roots institutions of the countries, the political sentiments of the majority of the people, or the substantive expertise in the matters discussed.

It is time for American decision-makers, in Congress, in the Administration, even in corporate boardrooms, to make the extra effort to listen to what the people of the region themselves, their elected leaders, are actually saying. This Conference is an important part of that process.

In closing, however, I would like to direct a few suggestions not to our American hosts but to ourselves, the public and private-sector leaders of the Caribbean Basin.

If we have gotten nothing else from CBI, we have learned that we are one. We are a region, indeed with unique nations but with many common interests. We can work together.

Today the countries of the Caribbean islands and Central America, along with our larger neighbors North and South, are working together. We are cooperating more and more closely in the war against narcotics trafficking. We are working closely on the CBI-II policy effort. We are discovering more opportunities for intra-Caribbean and cross-Caribbean-Basin trade and joint ventures.

We can look to the future with hope.

When we look to Europe, we needn't see the coming unitary market in 1992 as an approaching doom. There is no reason why a free market, approached effectively, cannot enhance our own opportunities.

When we look to Asia, we need not just see competitors for our jobs and exports. We can also see potential investors and joint venture partners and tourists and lenders.

As we in the Caribbean stand at the crossroads between the CBI's access to the U.S. market and Lome's access to the European market, we can use this dual advantage to attract trade and investment from all over the world.

In the spirit of that challenge, we face with confidence the wave of elections coming up over the next year in the Caribbean and Central America.

In the spirit of that challenge, we look forward with confidence to working with a new U.S. President and Congress, and with the nations of Europe and Asia—so many of them represented here.

In the spirit of that challenge, we can go forth from here with confidence to build the economic institutions, the political institutions, the educational resources, and the broadly shared prosperity our people want and deserve.

Thank you very much.

SENATE—Wednesday, January 25, 1989

(Legislative day of Tuesday, January 3, 1989)

The Senate met at 12 noon, on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. BYRD].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray:

Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!—Psalm 133:1.

Mighty God, perfect in love, Author of peace, thank Thee for the 200-year miracle that is America—"E Pluribus Unum." Thank Thee for authentic unity in diversity which, like a rich tapestry of many colors, has one design. We know that "united we stand, divided we fall." Grant us the will to unity in diversity and the determination to resist division which leads to futility and destruction.

In the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is recognized.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings be approved to date.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SCHEDULE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, for the information of all Senators, the Senate will be in session today until 6 p.m., or 6:30 p.m., sometime in that area. If a unanimous-consent agreement can be entered, there will be three back-to-back votes beginning at 5:30 p.m. The first vote will be a 15-minute vote on the nomination of James Baker III to be Secretary of State. This vote will be followed by a 10-minute vote on the nomination of Elizabeth Hanford Dole to be Secretary of Labor. The final vote will be a 10-minute vote on the nomination of Richard Darman to be Director of the Office of Management and Budget.

Hearings are being held this week on the following nominations: John Tower to be Secretary of Defense; Emanuel Lujan to be Secretary of the Interior; Robert Mosbacher to be Secretary of Commerce; Louis Sullivan to be Secretary of Health and Human Services; Jack Kemp to be Secretary of Housing and Urban Development; Samuel Skinner to be Secretary of Transportation; Carla Hills to be U.S. Trade Representative; and Michael Boskin to be a member of the Council of Economic Advisers.

In order that these hearings will be able to proceed uninterrupted, so that we may accommodate the request made by President Bush to me to expedite the handling of his nominees, it is my plan to not be in session tomorrow, to have a pro forma session on Friday, with no business transacted, and to be next in session on Tuesday, January 31.

On Tuesday, I am hopeful that committees will have reported the nominations of Mr. Lujan, Mr. Mosbacher, and Mr. Skinner. I would plan to vote on these and any other nominations which might be reported by that date.

It is my hope that this schedule will permit committees to proceed efficiently with the hearings on the Cabinet nominations, to enable the Senate to act on these nominations in a timely fashion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Staff will please be seated.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS—UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, as if in executive session, I ask unanimous consent that at 3 p.m. on January 25, 1989, the Senate go into executive session to consider the nomination of James A Baker III, to be Secretary of State, under a time agreement of 1 hour equally divided between the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PELL], and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. HELMS], or their designees; provided that at the conclusion or yielding back of time the nomination be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed, without any intervening business to the nomination of Elizabeth Hanford Dole to be Secretary of Labor, under a time agreement of 30 minutes equally divided between the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. HATCH], or their designees; provided that at the conclusion or yielding back of time the nomination be temporarily laid aside and the Senate proceed, without any intervening business, to the nomination of Richard G. Darman to be Director of the Office of Management and Budget, under a time agreement of 1 hour equally divided between the Senator from Ohio [Mr. GLENN], and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. ROTH], or their designees; provided further that at 5:30 p.m. the Senate proceed, without any intervening business, to a 15-minute vote on the nomination of James A. Baker III, and upon completion of that vote the Senate proceed, without any intervening business, to a 10-minute vote on the nomination of Elizabeth Hanford Dole, and that upon completion of the vote the Senate proceed, without any intervening business, to a 10-minute vote on the nomination of Richard G. Darman.

I ask unanimous consent that it be in order to request the yeas and nays on all three nominations en bloc at this time with one show of seconds.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SPECTER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SPECTER. Reserving the right to object, I inquire of the distinguished majority leader how much time did he say there would be provided for debate on the nomination of Mr. Baker?

Mr. MITCHELL. One hour.

Mr. SPECTER. I had made an inquiry yesterday of our own Cloakroom asking for 10 minutes on the nomination of Mr. Baker and 5 minutes on Mrs. Dole. I would appreciate having that much time. I do not know how it is going to be formulated based on what the majority leader has said.

Mr. MITCHELL. The unanimous-consent request provides that the allocation of time be under the control of the chairman and ranking members of the respective committees. I see the distinguished Senator from North Carolina, who would control the time on Mr. Baker.

Mr. HELMS. If the Senator will yield, I shall assure the Senator that he will have 10 minutes on the Baker nomination.

Mr. SPECTER. I thank the distinguished ranking member and the distinguished majority leader.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are two requests before the Senate. Is there an objection to the request that the yeas and nays be ordered on one show of seconds on the three nominations? The Chair hears none and it is so ordered.

Does the majority leader wish to ask for that show of seconds now?

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by a Member of the Senate on the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes. I now ask for the yeas and nays on all three nominations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there a sufficient second? Obviously, there is.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Now, the several requests by the distinguished majority leader with respect to the sequence of votes and the time and the control of debate are before the Senate. Is there an objection? The Chair hears none and that will be the order of the Senate.

RECESS UNTIL FRIDAY, JANUARY 27, AT 10 A.M. AND TUESDAY, JANUARY 31, AT 2 P.M.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate recesses today, it stand in recess until Friday, January 27, 1989, at 10 a.m., and that on Friday, no business be transacted; that immediately following the convening of the Senate, the Senate then stand in recess until Tuesday, January 31, at 2 p.m.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? There being no objection, that will be the order of the Senate.

CONSTITUTIONAL COMPROMISE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, 200 years ago, the Members of the First Congress took the oath of office. The experiment in self-government which they began is now the longest-running and most successful ever. It has given each of us the privilege of being citizens of the most open, the most prosperous, the most just, the most free society in human history.

Two centuries ago the American people and their Government entered into a social contract. That contract was set forth in the Constitution.

It was and is a unique charter of Government, making clear that power flows from the people to the Government, not the other way around.

The men who wrote the Constitution could not have foreseen the changes that have taken place between their time and ours. The genius of the American system has been its ability to adapt to change.

We enter a new era. The New Deal and the Reagan reaction to it are over. We face new circumstances.

They bring fresh challenges—

To respond to new leadership in the Soviet Union;

To protect our citizens from drugs and crime;

To safeguard our environment; and

To awaken the spirit of American citizenship.

Democrats in the Senate will have two objectives as we attempt to meet these and other challenges.

The first will be to reestablish a bipartisan foreign policy and put the divisions of the past behind us.

The second is to establish a new social contract that defines not only what our country will do for our citizens, but what our citizens will do for our country.

The primary obligation of Government is to protect the Nation's security. That means a strong America.

Strength means military strength, an essential aspect of world leadership. It also means economic strength, without which no nation can maintain its military strength.

Our ideals and our self interest demand strong and sustained American support for freedom and democratic values around the globe.

Throughout this century, the Democratic Party has affirmed the positive role of the United States as an agent of democratic change in the world. From Woodrow Wilson's Fourteen Points, to Franklin Roosevelt's Call for the Four Freedoms, to John Kennedy's Alliance for Progress in Latin America and Jimmy Carter's fight for human rights around the world, Democrats have stood for freedom, democracy, and human dignity.

That worldwide quest for freedom and human rights springs from the best impulses in the American tradition. It also reflects the fact that a world of peaceful democracies, where human rights are acknowledged and political liberties are respected, is a world that best serves American interests.

The movement to individual freedom and democratically elected governments has accelerated in recent years because the cause of individual liberty is irresistible. People want it. Technology feeds their desires. The experiments of totalitarians are winding down. They have failed. They could not assure either bread or liberty, and people demand both.

In his Inaugural Address, the President put his hand out to me and to the Speaker of the House. I now extend mine to him. I say to the President, to Senator DOLE, to my Republican colleagues, we will work together to increase the momentum toward freedom, to extend the search for democracy.

To do that we must restore bipartisanship in foreign policy.

The responsibility for our defense is shared by the President and the Congress. But in recent years, it sometimes seemed as if we were opposing each other rather than exercising shared powers. That need not be.

It serves no purpose to refight the political battles of the past. We are here to make a new start. A central aim of that new start for me is to pledge to President Bush that I will do my utmost to foster true bipartisanship.

But full, timely and meaningful consultation with Congress is the basis—indeed, it is the prerequisite—for bipartisanship.

The Constitution explicitly vests the power to declare war in the Congress.

So long as the ultimate sanction remains force, as it does in the world today, we, the Congress, are constitutionally directed to make that grave judgment for the Nation.

Our Nation pursues no war of conquest. Yet we find that we are drawn into smaller conflicts where the lines between active hostilities and uneasy truce are unclear. That was the case in the Persian Gulf last year. It will be the case in other places in the future.

Our system should ensure that when force is necessary, it is used surely and for goals clear to all of us.

The War Powers Act was intended to produce that outcome by enabling Congress and the Executive to act jointly in pursuit of clear and broadly supported purposes. Unfortunately, the act has become the focus of constitutional dispute. In critical moments, the dispute over the law and its premises forces public debate away from the substance of policy, undermining our ability to build and sustain national unity.

Overcoming this stalement should be a high priority for both Congress and the Executive. Last year, in an effort to develop recommendations for a compromise, the Foreign Relations Committee held extensive hearings. Others, including myself and the distinguished President pro tempore, proposed revisions to the law.

Enacting any change in the law will encounter strongly held and conflicting views. But the effort should be made, not in a spirit of acrimony, but in a spirit that takes due account of the President's prerogatives in foreign affairs and the constitutional obligations of Congress.

I believe a constitutionally sound compromise is possible, and I shall work for it with the Foreign Relations Committee and the administration.

I hope the President will undertake meaningful consultation with the Congress on all major foreign policy decisions. That would not only reduce misunderstanding in this body, it would make Congress a partner in policy formulation. It would give the whole Government—not just one branch of it—an incentive to explain and support our policies as the President works to put them into effect.

A bipartisan foreign policy will give President Bush what he must have to govern effectively: The base on which to sustain public support for the pursuit of American goals overseas.

Like other policies, bipartisanship begins with words. But it cannot be made real by words alone, or by good intentions. It requires deeds to match words, action to carry out intention. Bipartisanship grows from shared responsibility.

Serious consultation will not prevent differences between the Congress and the President. There have always been such differences. There always will be.

But in the great eras of American leadership, the differences have been less important than the agreements. When partisanship stops "at the water's edge" our Nation can achieve great goals and exercise world leadership for the benefit of people everywhere.

The potential for such an era is now upon us. We have an opportunity to join together to forge a new American consensus.

Working together, we can enhance our national resolve and purpose, and fulfill our national interests.

We must do that, for the needs within our own borders are great.

We inherit a national debt and a budget deficit that imposes its own harsh limits on all of us. We also have needs that cannot and will not wait.

It is time to redefine the social contract between Americans and their Government.

What do Americans have a right to expect of their Government? What are an American citizen's responsibilities?

Americans have the right to expect Government to encourage a strong, sound economy, without inflation.

The budget and trade deficits threaten our future. The President and the Congress have a responsibility to act on these deficits with courage and dispatch.

Our economy must become more productive. That means investment in new technology, innovation, and training. But today the budget deficit consumes the funds needed for that investment. It threatens our economic independence. It sends American jobs overseas. And the money we spend to service the debt is denied to other, more productive purposes. That is why we must bring the deficit down.

We look forward to receiving the President's budget proposals. We will work with him to achieve a bipartisan budget reduction agreement, one that is fair, credible and based on realistic economic projections.

The Democratic Policy Committee will soon present a detailed legislative agenda for this Congress. I do not intend this statement to do that.

That agenda will include proposals for dealing with many of the serious problems affecting our society:

The shame of the homeless and the growing lack of affordable housing;

The need for better health care;

The need to reverse the decline of investment in research and development.

The President recognized many of these needs in his inaugural address. He has yet to tell us how he proposes to meet them. We look forward to working with him on ways to achieve our common objective.

If we are to have a kinder, gentler nation, the Government must maintain law and order. People should be able to go about their daily business without fearing for their lives or their property.

Law enforcement is primarily a local responsibility. But it is a national responsibility to prevent the influx of drugs across our borders. In inner cities and suburbs, the violence and crime associated with drugs is increasing beyond the ability of local police to control it.

Congress last year passed a major antidrug bill. We will work with the President to fully fund it this year. But Government alone cannot solve the drug problem. Every citizen has an obligation to obey the law. That means not using illegal drugs.

Citizens also have a right to personal security against the violation of their health. Protection of the environment now requires global as well as national action.

When half the American people breathe air that does not meet basic health standards, when the water quality of many cities is unsure, when companies dump hazardous wastes illegally, citizens, neighborhoods and whole communities are placed at risk.

We must reduce the pollution from which all of us suffer. The Clean Air Act will be improved and extended. It is a controversial law.

But I hope we will be able to accommodate the concerns of the many Senators whose States will be affected by it, concerns that are legitimate and understandable.

Because the American contract between Government and people is to maintain human liberty and individual dignity, citizens have the right to expect that Government will secure a social and economic environment in which each citizen has an equal chance at success.

Equal opportunity does not require an equal outcome. Reward should be related to effort. But giving everyone a fair chance is the essential first step.

If a large percentage of our population, remains poorly educated, untrained and unmotivated, economic growth will be retarded and we will spend ever-increasing amounts on retraining, on social programs, on prisons and other institutions.

An improved standard of living depends on economic growth. To have a productive economy, we must have workers who can compete.

We must invest in early intervention in health and education through successful programs like Head Start.

We must also give fair opportunity to those who labor for the minimum wage. We will raise the minimum wage to a rate that will help those who depend on it.

We should encourage the effort to upgrade teacher quality in our schools. We should continue to improve science and math education, and build on our Nation's primacy in the field of computer learning and teaching.

We must support innovative corporate responses to the changes that have occurred in the work force. Businesses that adopt flexible hours, day care, and family leave policies that meet the demands of their work force deserve encouragement.

We will make sure the day care facilities needed by working families are available and affordable by enacting meaningful child care legislation.

These and other issues will be controversial. But we cannot avoid changes in our society by ignoring them. Working together, we can meet change and benefit from it in the traditional American way.

Our common goal is stability and prosperity. And because ours is a representative democracy, we seek that goal through common action.

In our society, public deference to Government authority is not routine. American Government must earn the respect and trust of American citizens.

When Americans believe that public office is a way to private enrichment, or that elective office is available only to the wealthy or well-connected, then the essential element of trust between the people and their Government is lost, and with it, Government's authority.

We must acknowledge the existence of public mistrust today. We must correct those factors that contribute to it which can be reached by legislation.

That means we must enact an ethics bill. It means we must pass a campaign finance reform bill for the Senate. It means we must ban the practice of accepting honoraria.

The ethics bill enacted last year but vetoed by President Reagan would have extended to former Members of Congress and their staffs the limits on lobbying which now apply only to high-level administration officials.

The use of Government service for private gain has an appearance that is corrupting. It taints every honest public servant. It opens public service to scorn.

The ability to govern depends on appearance as well as substance. So we will reintroduce the ethics legislation this year. We welcome President Bush's suggestions on this legislation. I hope that early this year we will agree on the best approach and enact it into law.

There will be introduced today a campaign reform bill. At the end of last year's debate we were much closer to agreement than we were at the beginning. With good faith efforts on both sides, the remaining differences can be resolved.

We must also eliminate the practice of accepting honoraria from groups with interests before the Congress.

These changes are essential if we are to act with authority on the issues that face us.

Government is not and should not be the focus of American life. But without Government action, life for many Americans would be harsher, narrower and more unfair than it is today.

Much of what we call legislating is our effort to define and act on the obligations of Government to the people. But what obligations define an American citizen?

Americans recognize that the privileges and liberties of a free society carry responsibilities and obligations.

Americans care about and love their country and its ideals. They want to be part of shaping its future.

What Government hasn't done often enough is ask them to participate. We should do so.

We should reestablish national service on a voluntary basis.

All of us seek a larger meaning in life. We need to know that our lives matter, that our actions count. In recent years, we have been encouraged only to seek personal goals. But personal gratification does not exhaust American ideals.

It is time to reactivate our idealism and the traditional American commitment to giving a helping hand. A program of voluntary national service is one way to do that. We will give a high priority to developing such a program in this Congress.

Two hundred years ago, the First Congress began the task of establishing national priorities. For them, the large question was the one the new States had put: What were the civil and political liberties that all Americans held to be "self-evident truths?" What were the limits to Government's power over the individual and the local community?

Their answer to those questions is enshrined in the Bill of Rights.

For 20th century Americans, the large question is: What must Government provide each American, and what will each American do for his country?

For the past few decades, the extremes have dominated the search for the answer to that question.

One answer has been that Government owes its citizens nothing but defense against external threat, and citizens owe Government nothing but the payment of taxes for which they are legally liable.

At the other extreme, the answer has been that Government must protect its citizens against every contingency, and the citizen's only duty is to make clear his changing needs.

Neither answer reflects the American ideal of national life.

We seek a national community whose members share fairly in prosperity and freedom and who in return do their part to help build prosperity and preserve freedom. The social contract is mutual, not defined alone by what Government must do. It imposes obligations on citizens as well.

America is a unique blend of optimism mixed with hard-headed practicality, of skepticism about Government mixed with idealistic expectations of Government.

I hope Americans never abandon their belief in the perfectability of our institutions and our society. Our common sense tells us perfection is not found in human institutions. But our American spirit tells us to seek it, nonetheless.

Our common goals are to preserve our Nation against foreign domination or threat; to create a society where each citizen's civil and political liberties are secure against the Government; to treat each citizen justly and equally.

To advance those general beliefs through specific actions is a challenge renewed for every Congress and every administration. It does not require or prohibit any particular idea.

It is up to each generation to take the best of all ideas and fit them to the American pattern. This is a challenge we accept gladly and in which we ask our people to join.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield?

Mr. MITCHELL. I yield.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I wish to compliment the majority leader on the statement the Senate has just heard.

As I was listening to the statement, I heard cadences from the Federalist Papers.

The eloquence of these remarks is very moving to me and I look forward to the leadership of the majority leader.

I was particularly pleased to hear included in this agenda such a prominent reference to the global environmental crisis which this body must help to combat.

Later today, after the distinguished Republican leader and others have spoken, I will be introducing legislation aimed at reducing CO_2 emissions, banning fluorocarbons, protecting biodiversity, dealing with the population crisis, and reforesting areas of the world that are now under siege.

In these and other efforts I look forward to working with the distinguished majority leader and Republican leader and I take great comfort from the force and strength of this opening address that we just heard.

Mr. MITCHELL. I thank the Senator for his remarks.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield?

Mr. MITCHELL. I yield.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I join in commending the majority leader for a very eloquent statement of the challenges that lie before us. I particularly want to thank him for the emphasis he placed in his statement on the fundamental values and principles that undergird our democratic system.

The majority leader throughout his career in the Senate, and indeed before as a very distinguished member of the Federal judiciary, has stressed the centrality of the Constitution in our political system and the importance of the principles encapsulated in the Constitution as the guiding principles of our Nation. That emphasis is reflected in the statement which he has made here today. I welcome it. I think it is a very important standard to which we can all repair.

I also strongly welcome the majority leader's emphasis on a social contract between the Government and the people. Such an understanding is an essential component in developing a national commitment to address the challenges that lie before us. I very much welcome the majority leader's statement and join others in commending him for it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I thank the Senator.

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield?

Mr. MITCHELL. I yield.

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. President, on the day of the inauguration of the President we all heard a very eloquent statement referred to by the majority leader about the responsibilities of individuals and the responsibility of individuals with their Government.

That was reflected again today in the very eloquent remarks of the majority leader, and I join my colleagues in commending the majority leader and commending my colleagues to the charge that we have been given. It seems to me that charge, among others, includes two very powerful themes.

One, it is of extraordinary importance for us to do everything we can to once again recharter a course that is bipartisan in nature wherever possible and, second, for us to eschew the extreme and find out once again where that center is because that center must hold.

The majority leader's very clear and eloquent comments on the roll and responsibilities of the Government, the constraints that are placed on the Government by individuals and our constitutional system is a reflection of what I believe is right and why I am in the institution.

I want to thank the majority leader for his very fine comments. We all look forward to his leadership and to a very fine 2 years. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. MITCHELL. I thank the Senator very much.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, Senator DOLE has a concurrent resolution dealing with the use of the rotunda to inaugurate a display of the POW-MIA flag that he would like the Senate to consider during his leadership.

I ask unanimous consent that it be in order to consider the resolution at this time and that there be no amendments or motions in order with respect to the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF THE REPUBLICAN LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the order, the Republican leader is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. I thank the distingished Presiding Officer.

PROVIDING FOR THE USE OF THE ROTUNDA OF THE CAPITOL TO INAUGURATE THE DISPLAY OF THE POW/MIA FLAG

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I send to the desk, on behalf of myself, Senator STEVENS and Senator MITCHELL, the concurrent resolution just referred to and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the title of the concurrent resolution.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 5) to provide for the use of the rotunda of the Capitol to inaugurate the display of the POW/MIA flag.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the concurrent resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, in the 100th Congress, I introduced, and the Congress passed, legislation to display the National League of Families POW/MIA flag in the Capitol rotunda until a satisfactory accounting of America's POW/MIA's has taken place. Today, I am pleased to submit a concurrent resolution, which has been cleared on both sides, to provide for the use of the rotunda on March 9 at 3 p.m. for a ceremonial unveiling of that flag.

The POW/MIA flag is a symbol to all Americans that we must never forget the brave men who made great sacrifices for their country in Vietnam, Korea, and World War II. Display of the flag in the Capitol rotunda will raise American consciousness on this critical national issue and serve as a reminder to the families of the missing servicemen that Congress and America will not rest until our POW/MIA's have been accounted for as full as possible.

While I am encouraged by some recent progress and cooperation from Vietnam and Laos on this matter, much more still needs to be done to locate our missing men. I was pleased to hear from President Bush in his inaugural address that his administration is committed to aggressively pursuing this cause.

Mr. President, it is fitting that the POW/MIA flag will be displayed adjacent to the statute of one of our greatest Presidents, Abraham Lincoln, who wished all men to be free. For as long as the families of or brave men still missing are enslaved by doubts about the whereabouts of their loved ones, we—as a nation—must continue to press for answers.

I hope all Senators will be able to join me on March 9 for this special ceremony to inaugurate the display of the POW/MIA flag.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further debate on the concurrent resolution? If not, the question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 5) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution, with its preamble, reads as follows:

S. CON. RES. 5

Whereas America can never forget the sacrifices of or brave servicemen still missing in action, nor the heroic suffering of our prisoners of war;

Whereas the families of Americans missing in Southeast Asia, having suffered greatly themselves, joined together in 1970 as the National League of Families to facilitate and promote the fullest possible accounting for POW/MIAs;

Whereas the official National League of Families POW/MIA flag symbolizes the nationwide recognition that is justly deserved by the missing and unaccounted for servicemen of all armed conflicts; and

Whereas the POW/MIA flag is an effective means of further raising public consciousness on this key American issue; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the rotunda of the Capitol may be used on Thursday, March 9, 1989, at 3 p.m., for ceremonies to observe the unveiling of the National League of Families POW/MIA flag which shall be displayed in the Capitol Rotunda until a satisfactory accounting of all America's POW/MIA's has taken place. The POW/MIA flag so displayed shall be in such size and at such place as the Architect of the Capitol, the Speaker and the Minority Leader of the United States House of Representatives, and the Majority and Minority Leaders of the United States Senate shall designate.

SEC. 2. The Architect of the Capitol may prescribe conditions for physical preparations with respect to the use of the rotunda authorized by the first section.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

GOOD-BYE, GOOD LUCK TO BOYD HOLLINGSWORTH

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, for myself and on behalf of my Republican colleagues, I want to wish one of our own, Boyd Hollingsworth, good-bye and good luck.

Boyd, who has been Senator SIMPSON's "man on the floor" for the past 4 years, is moving on to bigger and better things. He has been appointed by President Bush to be his Assistant for Legislative Affairs in the Senate. To put it simply, our loss is the President's gain.

Boyd has been a dedicated member of the Republican team—ever vigilant, ever helpful and informative. His knowledge of Senate procedures, as well as the substance of legislation has been of great help to me, and I know to all Republican Senators.

I know that AL SIMPSON will dearly miss Boyd's counsel and good cheer. But unlike many staffers who leave the Hill, whom we rarely see again, Boyd will continue to be a presence here. So, in every cloud, there is a silver lining.

Again, thank you Boyd, for your years of hard work and commitment. We wish you all the best in your new position.

THE REPUBLICAN AGENDA—THE 101ST CONGRESS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, first let me congratulate my friend and the majority leader in the U.S. Senate. We have not had an opportunity until this time to congratulate him on his election, on the way he has conducted himself, on the way we have been getting together trying to work out some of the problems in advance. And I assume that over the next several months we will be spending countless hours on opposite sides of the aisle but maybe not on opposite sides of the issue.

I listened carefully to the majority leader's speech. I commend him for that. It was an outstanding statement of his views and his values. I do believe that in many of the areas he touched upon we can find common ground.

So I congratulate the majority leader and wish him success in the coming months. I do believe that we have this spirit of bipartisanship in the White House and in the Congress.

I really believe that, in many cases, it is going to work and we are going to find ourselves, perhaps, completing legislation that in the past has been very, very troublesome.

I would say at the outset that I pledge my cooperation and my commitment to do what we need to do around here to make the Senate "work," as I did with the distinguished Presiding Officer, Senator BYRD. The Senate will function and should function smoothly. We should be efficient. We try to be.

I believe, as everyone knows, the leaders are almost powerless at times unless our colleagues on both sides of the aisle have the same spirit of cooperation and commitment. So we want to see, as everyone suggests, our quality of life improve and we want the quality of our work to be just as high as the expectations of people who elected us.

So I look forward to working with the distinguished majority leader and all of my colleagues on both sides of the aisle and in continuing the pursuit of bipartisanship that I shared with Senator BYRD, our new President pro tempore.

WRITING ON A CLEAN SLATE

Every 2 years the Senate starts with a clean slate. It is a slate upon which great acts may be written, new ideas take shape, old ones mature. As Senators, as legislators, we face awesome responsibilities and awesome possibilities. And those of us on this side of the aisle face an added charge—to support and further the cause of our new Republican President.

Only 5 days ago, George Bush was inaugurated the 41st President of the United States. He assumes the reins of power from Ronald Reagan, who history will note changed the course of America's future. A man who put us on a true course that has led to the two things most needed, most cherished, by the American people—peace and prosperity.

STAY THE COURSE

From everything he has said, there is little doubt that George Bush intends to "Stay That Course"—to make corrections when they are needed, to chart new directions when called for, but never to lose sight of our ultimate goals: To provide each and every citizen with the opportunity to achieve the American dream, and to ensure that they do so in a world at peace.

That, after all, is what the American people said they wanted last November 8. They heard what George Bush said, they read his lips, and they agreed with him—overwhelmingly.

On February 9, our new President will address the State of the Union. In that speech he will outline his program, his priorities for the coming year. And while it is unlikely it will mirror the agenda outlined by Senator MITCHELL, I expect that many of the same challenges are likely to be addressed.

From our perspective—on the Republican side of the aisle—there are four major areas of concern that we should tackle during the coming session. And there are five specific pieces of legislation that I am personally introducing today, reflecting my own priorities.

ECONOMIC CONCERNS

Topping the list are economic issues—first and foremost, of course, the deficit. We all agree that we have to take serious action to cut the deficit and comply with the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings target.

Frankly, I do not share a story that I saw in a leading paper a couple of days ago that the deficits do not matter. They matter to people in my State. They matter to people across the country. I think we have to face up to our responsibilities. Sooner or later someone will have to pick up the tab. Growth is important, but growth alone will not relieve the pressure.

And to do it, as the American people have said, without raising new taxes. Major decisions on the budget will help shape decisions on other policy matters—from national security to health care. In addition to the budget numbers, I believe it is finally time to institute reforms, including the constitutional amendment to balance the budget and enhanced rescission authority.

In fact, today I will introduce two pieces of legislation addressing budget reform. My proposed constitutional amendment would prohibit Congress from passing a budget in which outlays exceeded receipts except by a three-fifths vote. And to preserve a bias in favor of controlling spending, the amendment requires that increases in the level of taxation cannot be passed except by a majority of all members of the House and Senate; not just those present and voting.

It also seems to me it is time to give the President greater authority to eliminate spending for specific programs. One approach is the line-item veto—an authority I believe the President already has under the Constitution.

The President has rescission authority as well. But this budgetary tool has never really worked because Congress can, and usually does, simply ignore the President's rescission requests. The bill I will introduce today would force Congress to either approve or reject the President's rescission within a 10 day review period. Members are quick to criticize pork barrel spending, but slow to do anything about it. This bill makes Members put their votes where their rehetoric is.

Other economic issues we will undoubtedly be grappling with include the savings and loan crisis, and whether the Federal Government should play a role in the leveraged buyout phenomenon.

PEOPLE ISSUES, SOCIAL SECURITY

Then there are people issues: health—long-term care, aids, and prenatal care; workers' concerns—minimum wage and mandated benefits; and children's needs, child care and education; and of course, the homeless.

One issue of special interest to me, and of specific relevance to senior citizens, is their ability to work, and at the same time receive their full Social Security benefits. To address a problem with the current system, I am today proposing legislation that would phase out the Social Security earnings limit for those over 65. I can think of no better way to harness the unutilized talent of the elderly than to repeal this law, which discourages senior citizens from productive work.

America's elderly have already borne the burdens of decades of hard work. They have paid social security taxes throughout their working lives. Is it fair that they lose some of those benefits simply because they choose to continue offering their skill and ability to America? I don't believe it is.

In addition to the five major bills I am introducing today I will submit a number of other measures, including a measure to deal with the very special problems small rural hospitals face. And to help provide a measure of support to these institutions, I am reintroducing legislation today that would ensure that hospitals of 100 beds or less, in which Medicare patients comprise at least 70 percent of their discharges, receive payments of at least their reasonable cost. This program would last for 3 years, giving us the opportunity to carefully examine how we might do away with the current Medicare payment bias against rural institutions.

I can cite my own hometown where we have a hospital of 35 or 40 beds with seven or eight patients and there are literally hundreds of hospitals in small rural areas that are going to be forced to close their doors unless the Congress addresses this problem very quickly.

Finally, in the domestic area, we face immeiate problems with both energy and the environment: Nuclear energy and nuclear waste disposal, the Clean Air Act renewal and toxic waste—all are problems that should be confronted and resolved in the months ahead.

CHEMICAL WEAPONS

In the days and months ahead the new administration will confront a number of issues affecting our relationships with foreign nations and our own security. Certainly, high on the list is what direction United States-Soviet relations take. I think it is imperative that we, the United States, take the initiative and set the agenda with the Soviets. But in order to do that, the administration and Congress must be in sync—we must work together to develop a strategy encompassing arms control, regional conflicts, and human rights.

On the national security front, we must again debate the size and shape of our defense capability and how that relates to the arms control agenda. In that context as well, we should discuss whether our allies should assume greater responsibility for their own security.

On one item I believe there is bipartisan consensus.The time has come to reexamine the War Powers Resolution. This is an issue of considerable concern to the administration, as well. So, I hope that before we start hearings on specific legislation, all sides have the opportunity to exchange views, and perhaps see if some common ground exists. Given recent events, I hope we will carefully examine what actions we might take to combat terrorism, and pay special attention to chemical weapons.

The unchecked spread of chemical weapons is the most immediate threat to regional peace and American interests in the real world of 1989. If the capacity to create, store and deliver chemical weapons finally falls into the hands of lunatics like Qadhafi, then we will truly be in not a brave, but a scary, new world. The bill I and others will introduce today is certainly not a panacea—but it is an essential step in what must be a broad strategy. A chemical weapons capability is not a "home grown" product in Libya—the expertise, and much of the equipment and material, must be imported.

Our bill will require a report from the President on what foreign companies are aiding and abetting the spread of chemical weapons around the world; and that report will trigger sanctions against those companies, shutting them out of the American market for a long time. The leverage is real, and the message will be clear—do business with the likes of Qadhafi, and you can kiss good-bye to the American market. The bill will also tighten up our domestic contron regime, to insure that American firms are not knowingly or inadvertently facilitating the spread of chemical weapons.

CAMPAIGN FINANCE REFORM

Finally, there are a number of institutional issues we must confront, campaign finance reform, chief among them.

I know that last year my good friend, the Presiding Officer, Senator BYRD, made every effort he could to bring about some campaign finance reform. As the majority leader said, we were close to an agreement a number of times, but we couldn't quite get there.

A group of Republican Senators will join me today as I introduce the 1989 Congressional Campaign Reform Act. This bill is designed to bring the individual back into the electoral process. We believe that it is the main street American—not the Wall Street executive, the labor union boss, or the PAC Director—who should ultimately have the influence in the electoral process. Toward that end, this bill would reduce PAC contributions, adjust individual contributions, impose strict disclosure rules on "soft" money expenditures, tighten restrictions on independent expenditures and close the so-called millionaire's loophole.

In addition to campaign finance reform, we must also come up with rules to make sure that those who work in government—whether congress or the executive branch—comply with the highest possible ethical standards, as indicated previously by the distinguished majority leader.

This is an issue which the Bush administration is addressing this very day and I know intends to pursue vigorously.

I would hope that we could get together on some bipartisan approach on ethics. I would say I think the bill we passed last year is a good place to start. But in my view, we need to make certain we don't penalize a lot of the young people around here who work for us and work in our offices and our staffs, who may want to go out into the private sector and still have some relationship, appropriate relationship with Congress.

FULFILLING OUR CHARGE

None of us wants to see any man or woman who wants a job, unemployed; or a child whose parents work, uncared for. None of us wants people left homeless, sleeping on the streets or in overcrowded shelters; or our elderly deprived of adequate medical care; our children receiving a second-rate education. None of us wants our beaches closed down because of pollution. None of us wants to see our defense capability threatened because we can not produce the necessary nuclear components safely, or our citizens prevented from traveling freely because of the threat of terrorism.

Now, we can not solve all of these problems. The President can't solve all of these problems. And in some instances we, the Federal Government, should not even try.

The responsibility should be State or local government's, or even the private sector's. But I have no doubt that those of us here today on both sides of the aisle are committed to trying. And there is a Federal responsibility in many, many areas.

So, during this, our bicentennial Congress, let us use our clean slate wisely. If we do, we will fulfill our charge as members of the Senate and keep the beacon of light and hope this Nation radiates to its own citizens and the world's beaming brightly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I commend the distinguished Republican leader for his statement. It is a very positive and eloquent one and I look forward very much to working with him during this year, as he and I both recognize there are going to be many disagreements but I think the attitude that he has demonstrated has been very positive, one which will make it possible for us to work together on our areas of agreement and to compete vigorously and fairly in the areas in which we disagree.

So, I look forward to that very much.

MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senate will now commence the transaction of morning business for a period not to exceed 2 hours with Senators to speak therein not to exceed 10 minutes each.

AMENDING THE STANDING RULES OF THE SENATE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, now on behalf of Senator PRYOR and myself, I send to the desk two resolutions making changes in the Senate rules, and I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to their consideration en bloc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The the clerk will state the resolutions by title for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 9) to amend the Standing Rules of the Senate to limit sense of the Senate or Congress amendments.

A resolution (S. Res. 10) to amend the Standing Rules of the Senate to impose a strict 15 minute limit on votes in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolutions?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being heard, the resolutions will go over en bloc, under rule XIV, paragraph 6.

The majority leader is recognized.

AMENDING THE STANDING RULES OF THE SENATE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, on behalf of the distinguished President pro tempore, I send another rules resolution to the desk and ask unanimous consent the Senate proceed to its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the resolution for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 11) to provide for germaneness or relevancy of amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I respectfully object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being heard, the resolution will go over under rule XIV, paragraph 6.

The majority leader is recognized.

INTEGRITY IN POST-EMPLOYMENT ACT OF 1989

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I understand the distinguished senior Senator from South Carolina, Senator THURMOND, has introduced at the desk the integrity in Post-Employment Act; am I correct?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That measure is at the desk.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, as I indicated in my remarks earlier, this bill, sponsored by Senator THURMOND, cosponsored by many Senators on both sides of the aisle, warants prompt consideration in this Congress. The bill which Senator THURMOND introduced this morning was passed unanimously by the Senate last April and the bill reported from the conference committee was pocket-vetoed by President Reagan in October.

We believe that it is essential to restore the public's trust in the integrity of those individuals who work in the Government. I am today commencing the rule XIV process to have that bill placed on the legislative calendar of business. I do not intend to call this bill up for a reasonable period of time. We want to give the Bush administration an opportunity to review this issue and to make recommendations as they have requested.

However, by having the bill on the calendar, it will be available for the Senate to consider at an appropriate time. Mr. President, I ask that the bill be read for the first time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will read the title of the bill for the first time.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1) to amend section 207 of Title 18, United States Code, to prohibit Members of Congress and officers and employees of any branch of the United States Government from attempting to influence the United States Government or from representing or advising a foreign entity for a proscribed period after such officer or employee leaves government service, and for other purposes.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask that the bill be read for the second time.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection having been heard, the second reading of the bill will go over 1 legislative day.

THE 1988 YEAREND REPORT

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, the mailing and filing date of the 1988 Yearend Report required by the Federal Election Campaign Act, as amended, is Tuesday, January 31, 1989. Principal campaign committees supporting Senate candidates file their reports with the Senate Office of Public Records, 232 Hart Building, Washington, DC 20510-7116.

The Public Records Office will be open from 8 a.m. to 9 p.m. on the filing date to accept these filings. In general, reports will be available to the public 24 hours after receipt. For further information, please contact the Public Records Office on 202-224-0322.

TRIBUTE FOR DR. WILLIAM E. ALLEN

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I rise today to commend Dr. William E. Allen, director of the Washington office of the American Dental Association, a dentist who exemplifies a selfless service too little evident these days.

It has been my privilege to know and work with Bill Allen since he came to Washington 3 years ago. At that time he gave up a distinguished career as a pediatric dentist in Pasadena, CA, to head the ADA office here. Prior to coming to Washington, Bill Allen was actively involved in the California Dental Association including service as that association's president. In addition, he served for 14 years in the ADA House of Delegates and for 7 years on the association's council on legislation. Bill Allen chaired the council and many other dental boards and committees, while maintaining an active practice dedicated to improving the oral health of children.

Bill Allen's public service career has been guided by his dedication to improving the image and future of the American dental profession. He is keenly aware of the role the dental profession maintains in the health community and has worked tirelessly to make sure that dentistry's message is heard. In the process he has effectively expanded the role of the dental profession in the political and legislative processes.

He has served his profession well. Maybe, too well. Bill Allen has been promoted and will be leaving Washington to become the American Dental Association's associate executive director at their headquarters in Chicago.

We wish him well and take this opportunity in the Chamber of the U.S. Senate to salute his selfless service.

Mr. CRANSTON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The assistant Democratic leader [Mr. CRANSTON].

COMMENDATION OF THE NEW MAJORITY LEADER

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I want to join in the words of commendation for the eloquent statement by our new majority leader. He set forth a very thoughtful program for our Congress and for our country on the great and small issues of our time. I am delighted that he has spelled out so clearly and forcefully and eloquently the tasks that lay before us, and I look forward to working with him in the fulfillment of the very noble goals he set forth, not only for us in the Government but for the citizens of our country who have a vital part to play in the success or the failure of these goals.

I also want to applaud the Republican leader for his statement and his fine view of many issues where I know we will find common ground and be able to work together.

AN OVERVIEW OF S. 11 THROUGH S. 15

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I will be introducing a number of bills today, and I would like to focus for a few minutes on the first five of those bills, S. 11 through S. 15.

These bills deal with a variety of issues which I believe are important to the Nation as well as the State of California. They range from protecting the environment, improving our educational system, meeting the needs of America's veterans, dealing more effectively with the health crisis posed by AIDS, and enhancing health care services for all Americans.

The first of these bills is S. 11, the California Desert Protection Act—legislation designed to provide lasting protection for the beauty and wildness of the California Desert.

The California Desert is a place of unrivaled scenic, geologic, and wildlife resources, a land of almost incomprehensible beauty that attracts millions of visitors from all over the world annually. But the California Desert is increasingly threatened by incompatible use and development. My California Desert bill will stop the destruction of the desert's special places while allowing multiple uses of the desert. It expands Death Valley and Joshua Tree National Monuments and redesignates them as national parks. It also creates a new Mojave National Park, comprising 1.5 million acres. And it designates 4.5 million BLM land in the California Desert as wilderness. In reintroducing the California Desert Protection Act today, I have high hopes the 101st Congress will ensure that the California Desert remains a national treasure to be enjoyed and cherished by all Americans, now and in the future.

A companion measure will be introduced in the House by Congressman MEL LEVINE of California.

The second bill I am introducing today is S. 12, the Parents as Partners in Learning Act of 1989.

My education bill addresses one of the greatest needs in education, and that is to encourage parents to help their children succeed academically. All that we know about successful schools tells us that parent and community support and understanding is critical to education excellence. We also know that parents will actively support their children's education if they are shown how to do so effectively. Yet most of the recent major education reports do not mention families as a factor in education success and only one or two make any recommendation for school reform based on involving parents. My bill sets forth a modest grant program, based upon criteria drawn from a very successful California program, that will help schools teach parents how best to boost the academic achievement of their children.

The third bill I am introducing today is S. 13, the Veterans Benefits and Health Care Act of 1989.

This bill would provide for COLA's in compensation, rehabilitation, and education and training benefits paid to veterans who have service-connected disabilities and to the dependents and survivors of certain service-disabled veterans.

The needs of these veterans and their families are my top priority as chairman of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs. This bill would also extend a program fostering Federal employment of Vietnam and disabled veterans and provide for needed improvements in a variety of benefits and services programs conducted by the Veterans' Administration, which on March 15 will become the newest Cabinet-level Department, the Department of Veterans' Affairs. The bill also contains important provisions designed to improve and expand treatment of and research into posttraumatic stress disorder—called PTSD—a very serious psychiatric disability currently afflicting almost a half million Vietnam veterans.

The Nation still has some major unfinished business, which it must not further postpone or avoid, in keeping faith with the brave men and women who are veterans of the long and divisive war in Vietnam. Through this bill and in other ways, I will be doing all that I can to ensure that our obligation to these and all other veterans are fully met.

Mr. President, the fourth bill I am introducing today, S. 14, is the AIDs Health Services Act of 1989.

This bill focuses on one of the most serious questions regarding the AIDS epidemic: How do we provide and pay for services for the increasing number of people with AIDS? AIDS patients require a broad range of health care and social services, including mental health services, home care, housing, hospice, addiction treatment, case management services, transportation, and legal services. Unfortunately, few communities are capable of providing these services and have limited resources to develop them. My bill would establish a grant program to help communities develop them. My bill would establish a grant program to help communities develop coordinated systems of care to people infected with the HIV virus.

Finally, Mr. President, the fifth bill I am introducing today is the Emergency Medical Services and Trauma Care Improvement Act of 1989. This bill is designed to improve emergency medical services and trauma care.

Each year, more than 140,000 Americans die from injuries. Injury is the fourth leading cause of death among all Americans and the major killer of children and young adults. Unlike other diseases, much of the death and disability resulting from injury could be prevented. We do not need a miracle cure—we need only to organize and allocate medical resources to ensure that trauma victims are rapidly identified and transported to facilities that can provide specialized trauma care. This bill, S. 15, would provide a modest amount of funding to help States and communities set up trauma systems that meet certain requirements and provide limited financial relief to trauma centers threatening to close because of high uncompensated care costs associated with trauma.

Mr. President, in addition to these five bills designated as S. 11 through S. 15, I will be introducing today and in the near future other measures dealing with pressing national interests.

The agenda before the 101st Congress is very full and rightly so. There are many, many issues that have not been adequately addressed in the past decade. We need to move forward in many areas—housing, the crisis in the thrift industry, voter registration reform, child care, equal rights, and civil rights for all Americans, long-term health care, safeguarding the environment—ranging from global warming and ozone depletion to protecting the California coast—drugs, crime, the deficit, helping America's business remain competitive in the international marketplace, seeing to it that the money we invest in national defense is wisely and prudently spent, and working worldwide in the cause of freedom, human rights, and peace.

I look forward to working with Democratic and Republican Senators, with House Members, with the Bush administration, with constituents and citizens from all across the land to meet the challenges that lie before us.

WILLIAM V. SHANNON—JOURNALIST, AMBASSADOR, AND FRIEND

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, all of us who knew him were shocked and saddened to learn of the death last September of William V. Shannon. In the course of his brilliant career as a journalist and Ambassador to Ireland, Bill Shannon won many admirers in Congress and across the country. We shall miss his friendship, his wise counsel, his insightful columns and editorials, and his many contributions to the special relationship between the United States and Ireland.

A number of Bill Shannon's friends paid tribute to him at a mass in Brookline, MA, on September 30 and at a memorial mass in Dublin on November 2. I believe that the tributes, from both sides of the Atlantic, will be of interest to all of us who knew Bill Shannon and who admired his dedication to excellence, and I ask unanimous consent that the remarks at the services and other materials may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MASS FOR HON. WILLIAM V. SHANNON, ST. AIDAN'S CHURCH, BROOKLINE, MA, SEPTEMBER 30, 1988

REMARKS BY MARTIN F. NOLAN, EDITORIAL PAGE EDITOR OF THE BOSTON GLOBE

One week ago today, in the brilliant sunshine of California, I deposited a quarter in a newspaper box and was rewarded with a column by Bill Shannon on the editorial page of the Peninsula Times-Tribune in Palo Alto.

Like every Bill Shannon column I have ever read, going back to the old New York Post in the 1950s, it was as crisp and clear as an autumn day in New England. The passion in it resonated as eloquently as a speech before the gallows of a young Irish patriot.

The pleasure that any Bill Shannon column gives was doubly enhanced because I hoped it meant the resumption of his weekly column, which gave him and his readers such pleasure and satisfaction. It was not meant to be.

Liz Shannon introduced me the other day to a vistor from Ireland saying "Marty Nolan was Bill's boss at the Boston Globe." Can you imagine such a thing? "And a very unruly lad he was," I replied. Bill's boss, indeed.

Let me tell you the people at the Boston Globe who will really miss Bill Shannon. They are the unsung heroes of the copy desk—Merv Harvey, Marj Pritchard, Connie Noonan, Karen Dobkin. They must translate Boston Globe opinion into English every day. When Bill's copy came by, they automatically smiled because they knew they would never have to scratch their heads and say "What does this mean?" Bill's copy was clean, flawless and on time!

Bill's passion for clarity meant that his clarity enhanced his passion. He was a role model for all of us. Dave Nyhan said the other day that we all want to grow up to be Bill Shannon. The rolling thunder of his prose belied the gentleness of his demeanor, his easygoing elegance. He set high standards. He was a professional and a gentleman who made the art of disagreeing agreeable.

Oh, and what a model of sartorial splendor he was as well! He was a great walking ad for Monaghan's tailors of Dublin among us toilers in corduroy and polyester. One day, after his wit, erudition and knowledge of history enlivened and elevated a discussion among editorial writers, he said, "Ah, but we're all just ink-stained wretches, Marty."

I knew better than that. He was so much more.

When Bill worked for the New York Times, I learned the power of his prose from one of his admirers, Russell Baker. Bill was a fill-in summer columnist, as you recall. In Nantucket one night Russ said "Well, I won't extend this vacation because Bill Shannon is substituting and if any one of us is slow getting back, why common sense says he ought to stay there on the page."

Bill went to Dublin instead for a masterful stay in Phoenix Park. Never was the United States more capably or energetically represented. He always retained a keen interest in the newspaper business, though.

On or about St. Patrick's Day, 1980, Bill and Sean Donlon—then Ireland's ambassador to the United States—met in a new Irish bar in Washington. It was founded by Hughie Kelly of Connemarra, but it still had the Polynesian decor of its previous occupant. An outrigger canoe loomed over our table. "Perhaps it's St. Brendan's canoe," said Bill, as we competed to find a new name for the restaurant—Toora Loora Lau, Trader Mick's and so forth. Hughie settled on The Irish Times.

If Bill's tour of duty might end with that year's election, President Reagan seeming to have a good chance to beat Jimmy Carter, I would hope he'd keep the Boston Globe in mind upon his return, I told Bill. He kept a diplomatic silence, but despite offers elsewhere, he chose Boston University and the Boston Globe.

We were delighted and blessed that God gave us Bill Shannon for these past eight years and saddened that it could not be many more. What a great newspaperman he was. More important, what a great man!

REMARKS BY JON WESTLING, EXECUTIVE VICE PRESIDENT OF BOSTON UNIVERSITY

Last June 1 marked the beginning of what would have been Bill Shannon's eighth year as a member of the faculty of Boston University. But as a figure in the larger world he had been a part of our academic community much longer than that. As the citation of the honorary degree that he received from the university in 1976 read, "many of us awake to find you before us in the morning, and for years we have been pleased to begin the day with your clear, equitable, conscientious voice." Others can better speak to his career as a journalist, but that the best journalism is a form of teaching is a point Bill proved by making the transition from public service and journalism to academic life with the same grace that marked the other transitions in his life—including this final transition.

He gave the commencement address that year, the year of the bicentennial. Its title was, "America: The Double Quest." In it he spoke of the search for justice and the search for equality, and of the hard but essential task of balancing the two. This concern for balance, for the equipoise of opposites, was deeply characteristic of him.

He sought and, with admirable success, achieved a balance between the life of action and the life of contemplation. And it always seemed to me that he and Elizabeth had also achieved a balance that is even rarer: between a serious and productive public life and a richly rewarding private life.

Balance is among the most difficult virtues to cultivate; yet once achieved it can seem—however edifying—rather bland. Bill was never bland. He somehow managed to balance (to choose an Irish way of putting it) with Irish enthusiasm.

His enthusiasms were genuine, even passionate, but they were tempered by his perspicacity, his keen ear for the false note in people and in situations. He loved journalism, but was ruefully aware of its shortcomings. He loved Ireland, but it was with a mature love that sees and accepts the blemishes no less than the beauty. He was deeply committed to the Democratic Party, but knew that virtue is more frequently found in individuals than in collectivities. He loved teaching, but approached it with the wisdom of one who knows that not everything that is learned is taught and not everything that is taught is learned—or worth learning. He loved students, and they loved him, in part perhaps because they sensed his awareness of the storms that sweep the difficult transition from late adolescence to early adulthood.

Bill Shannon was, in short, the sort of person academic communities are designed to create, foster and protect—and the sort of person academic communities must have if their project, the project of education, is to have any chance of success. He was a virtuous man—a journalist of splendid integrity, an exemplary public servant, a good husband, good father, good citizen, good friend. For seven years he gave us at Boston University the best of his wit, his charm, his unquenchable intellectual curiosity, his learning, his grace, his balance, and his enthusiasms. Hundreds of students and colleagues were far the better for knowing him; we shall be far the poorer without him. But we are grateful for what we had, and even in our sadness celebrate the wholeness of a worthy life.

Liz, Liam, Christopher and David have written—with grief and pride and love—their own words about Bill; and they have asked me to read them to you. But before I do so, I want to speak for a moment of what Bill meant to me as a colleague and a friend.

In the years that I was associated with Bill on virtually a daily basis, I came to love this shy, reserved man with the somewhat formal manner and quizzical smile, as well as to respect him as one of the most knowledgeable and astute political analysts of our generation.

With his powers of almost total recall, Bill could give you the details—gory, amusing, unedifying as the case may be—of every campaign from dog-catcher to President during the past half-century, especially in this his native State.

Together with his vast store of knowledge he had a penetrating eye for the phony, the shabby, the corrupt. If he felt even the most exalted candidate was unfit for office, he had the courage to say so, always with the facts to back it up—as he did with great prescience in the case of one notorious vice presidential candidate more than 20 years ago. It was he who wrote the memorable phrase that appeared on the editorial page of the Times well before anyone else dared speak the words: "Spiro T. Agnew is unfit for the Office of Vice President of the United States."

Always the gentleman in manner, in dress and—far more important—in heart and spirit, Bill could slice up his toughest opponent without ever raising his voice or even a finger.

He was a man of deep but controlled passion, of unbounded compassion, of sensitivity, of profound convictions but of equally profound tolerance. He was a conservative in that he was a respecter and practitioner of the old-fashioned virtues and values. He was a liberal in the proudest historic American tradition, contemptuous of any effort to twist the word liberal into a form of opprobrium, because his political faith was grounded in a sense of individual freedom, independence and democracy.

Bill was fun to be with, and never more so than in his Dublin Embassy, where he and Liz were beloved by everyone from the powerful and prestigious to the tradesman and the tinker—not because they were the American Ambassador and his wife, but because they were themselves.

Though I worked with Bill for only a dozen years, my wife and I have counted him as a dear friend for twice that time. I admired and loved him, as I do his wife and children, whose words you will now hear.

EULOGY WRITTEN BY ELIZABETH B. LIAM, CHRISTOPHER, AND DAVID SHANNON, AND READ BY JOHN B. OAKES

Our loss is immeasurable.

Our comfort is the shining memory of a husband and father whose unfailing standards of honor, truth, fidelity, and kindness will continue to guide us for the rest of our lives.

He loved being a husband and a father. He was happiest in his home where he was surrounded by his family and the beautiful things he spent a lifetime collecting. He loved beautiful things: china, books, antique furniture, paintings, jewelry. If he had been a wealthy man, he would have been one of the world's great collectors.

He was a fastidious, elegant man whose fine shirts, polished shoes, conservative, well-cut suits—chosen with care and always made by his Dublin tailor—never gave way to even comfortable sloppiness. As we were leaving our New York apartment at midnight twenty-one years ago to make a hurried dash to Mt. Sinai Hospital to produce Christopher, he lingered dangerously long, staring into his closet, finally explaining: "It's important to choose the right tie when you're having a baby."

He was the ultimate indoor man—only his good nature and good humor got him out on the patio for a cook-out. With real bewilderment he would ask: "Why would you want to sit outside with mosquitoes and flies when you have a beautiful dining room?" Instead of taking his boys camping, he took them to fine restaurants and taught them to share his pleasure in good food.

He was a wonderfully generous husband who loved bringing his wife extravagant gifts and occasionally had to be reminded that his family faced bankruptcy if he didn't restrain himself.

He was a gentleman who loathed courseness of expression or feeling. The only time he cursed was when the Red Sox lost or he couldn't start the car. Then his extraordinary talent for expression was unmatched.

His sense of public right and wrong, always a theme in his writing, carried over into the education of his children. Once, in 1974, his eight-year-old son and a pal were thwarted in an attempt to get into a neighbor's garage to see a brand new bicycle, so they took a hammer to break the lock. Caught in the act, they were brought home to face the punishment doled out to them by Bill. When they attempted to excuse their actions as a trivial matter, he sat them down on the sofa and explained his position this way: "If Mr. and Mrs. Haldeman had made their little Johnny understand the difference between right and wrong, there might not have been a Watergate."

Life with Bill Shannon was an ongoing education. We all learned to understand and appreciate the political process and the preciousness of democracy from him. His patriotism was profound and visceral, and was exemplified in his writing and teaching. He understood the way his government worked and he loved and respected it. The greatest public joy of his life was to serve his country abroad.

He taught his wife and children by example and by words. Life in our home was an ongoing seminar in American history. It's not surprising that two of his sons and their two closest childhood friends are all history majors.

We never talked together of his impending death; we chose to hold out for hope. But in his final two days, when his disease and drugs had clouded his mind, he would murmur sentences that were disconnected in sequence, but clear and profound in meaning. The last sentence of his life was: "Violence is a sin that can never be justified for any political reason." In life and in death, that was his philosophy, his hope, and his goal.

Our pledge to him is to lead our lives by the example he set.

REMARKS BY HON. PADRAIC N. MACKERNAN, AMBASSADOR OF IRELAND TO THE UNITED STATES

Twenty-five years ago in 1963, President John Fitzgerald Kennedy came to Ireland on what was an historic and unforgettable visit.

He epitomized the success of the Irish Diaspora. He came to Ireland and he spoke to Dail Eireann, the Irish Parliament, in words that thrilled and moved anyone who heard him. It was a speech which reflected a love and knowledge of Ireland's cultural heritage, a concern for her people, and a pride in the achievements of Ireland.

The voice was that of President Kennedy. The words were those of Bill Shannon. Fifteen years later, Bill Shannon came to Ireland bearing the words of another American President when he presented his credentials as Ambassador of the United States.

He, too, was the son of the Irish Diaspora. And when he came to Ireland he brought those qualities which he displayed throughout his life, both as a journalist and author and as a public man—qualities of lucidity, compassion and detachment.

Lucidity to understand the depths and complexity of the problems of Ireland; compassion to be concerned about the success of Ireland as an independent nation, about its place in the world, about the links between Ireland and the United States, and about the contributions which Ireland has made to this country, and which the United States by encouragement and example has made and continues to make to Ireland.

He brought the detachment of a scholar who understands that complex political problems cannot be solved by simplistic and violent means. He did very well in Ireland as an Ambassador. And no small part of his success in that regard was the support and help of his wife Elizabeth and their children.

He was greatly revered while he was in our country. And that esteem continued when he returned here to resume his work as a journalist and historian. I think I could say that I knew Bill Shannon for many years—both vicariously when I read his work, and personally when he came to Ireland and when I came as Ambassador of Ireland to the United States. He was a warm and friendly man and a man who cared. That care was not limited. It extended to the artistic world in his concern for the American Irish Foundation and the American Ireland Art Exchange program.

I can do no better than to quote something from Bill Shannon's own writing, which shows the kind of man he was and the values which he tried to adhere to in his own life. In the last chapter of his book, "The American Irish", he writes:

"Political power in itself cannot be a morally worthy end. Those who exercise it are ultimately judged by the manner of its exercise and the ideals it served. Only if these moral criteria are controlling, can man advance towards the highest good".

Bill Shannon understood what these ideals mean in Ireland and also in this country. He knew that in Ireland power cannot grow from the barrel of a gun, but from the ability of men and women to work together to translate ideals and values into facts.

In his last days, he was still writing. He was a lover of poetry as well as a connoisseur of politics. His last article was one about T.S. Eliot, a poet who was also in some degree a public man.

I think I should end this tribute by quoting from another poet, who was also a public man, and whose words reflect the qualities that Bill Shannon cared about and that he translated into the facts of his own life. It is from Yeats' poem, "The Tower":

"I choose upstanding men . . . I declare
They shall inherit my pride,
The pride of a people that were
Bound neither to cause, nor to state,
Neither to slaves that were spat on,
Nor to the tyrants that spat,
The people of Burke and of Grattan
That gave, though free to refuse—
Pride, like that of the morn,
When the headlong light is loose
Or that of the fabulous horn,
Or that of the sudden shower
When all streams are dry
Or that of the hour
When the swan must fix his eye
Upon a fading gleam,
Float out upon a long
Last reach of glittering stream
And there sing his last song."

"Ar dheis De go raibh a anam dhilis".

(May his loyal soul be at God's right hand.)

REMARKS BY SENATOR EDWARD M. KENNEDY

In the revised edition of his classic work, "The American Irish," our friend Bill Shannon wrote these words about my brother Jack—"He was loved more than he knew." And that simple eloquent tribute is just as true of Bill Shannon, for he too was loved more than he knew.

In remembering Bill here, we also honor the extraordinarily loving Shannon family that was the core and foundation of his life—his wife, Liz, who was also his life-long partner in all he did and achieved, and his three children, Liam, Christopher, and David.

Of the many friends I inherited from Jack, Bill Shannon was one of the best—and certainly the brightest.

He had a long and enduring affection for President Kennedy. One spring day, while Bill was serving in Ireland as Ambassador, he made a point of traveling down to Wexford from Dublin, so that he could pay tribute to Jack on May 29th, my brother's birthday.

Bill probably never fully knew how much that perceptive gesture meant to me and to our family. For he was one of the first to understand how much we wished to remember Jack by marking the date of his birth, not the date of his death.

Later, Bill sent me a photograph of himself from that day, standing beside a memorial to President Kennedy that consisted of a stone fountain with some of Jack's most famous words inscribed in Gaelic—"Ask not what your country can do for you—ask what you can do for your country." I asked Bill how he knew what the inscription said. He replied that Gaelic was still Greek to him, but he had managed to learn just enough to be sure of the words.

In Bill's remarks that day in Wexford, he recounted a story about Jack that I recalled when Liz telephoned my Senate office with the sad news last Tuesday.

The original edition of "The American Irish" was published in January 1964. But advance copies had been sent out a few weeks earlier to newspapers and magazines. Publishers knew that President Kennedy liked to read, and many of them had begun sending him copies of their new books.

Two or three times a day, Jack used to step out of the Oval Office, to look over the letters and packages piled on the desk in the adjoining room. One day in November 1963, he noticed that several new volumes had come in, and "The American Irish" happened to be on top. Jack leafed through it and said, "This looks interesting. I'll read it when I get back from Texas."

For a quarter century, that was a poignant memory for Bill, and it is doubly poignant for me now, because when his illness came, Bill had just begun working closely with me in his spare time to gather recollections of my brothers and my family. I had come to know him especially well in these sessions. He was like a member of the family, and we loved him all the more.

I admired Bill for many things—most of all for the warm and caring and thoughtful friend he always was, but also for his intellect and judgment and the wide range of his interests. He loved to talk and fret about the Red Sox. Sad as these recent days have been for us, it may just be that with the Playoffs and Series coming up—God, in His wisdom, decided He needed an expert on the Sox—to teach all the heavenly hosts about the fine points of the game.

In 1967, Bill had published another book, "The Heir Apparent," a well-received campaign biography of Robert Kennedy—so I respected Bill's political advice as well. One day in the spring of 1979, he stopped by my Senate office to brief me on developments in Dublin and Northern Ireland. And when the briefing was over and conversation turned to other things, he remarked, "Ted, the Presidential polls look great. 1980 is your year for the White House." So, I took Bill's advice—but this time, the "heir apparent" was apparent only to Bill and me.

I recalled that conversation again last spring—when I opened the Globe one morning, turned to the weekly William V. Shannon column, and saw Bill's endorsement of Senator Albert Gore.

Irish to the core, Bill was proud of his roots in County Clare. He loved the Irish in all their ramifications and contradictions—the legends and stereotypes, the scholars and brawlers, the priests and politicians, the art and history, and especially the wit. A few weeks ago, we were regaling each other with the tale of the renegade Irishman jailed for 30 days for stealing a ham. It seems that after three weeks, his wife couldn't stand it any longer. So she went before the judge to plead for her husband's release.

Is he good to you, asked the judge? Well, no sir, he isn't. Does he treat the children well? No sir, he's mean to them. Does he stay at home when he's not in jail? No sir, he runs around a lot. Why on Earth do you want him back again? Well, to tell the truth, judge—we're about to run out of ham.

Because of Bill, we have a richer understanding not only of Irish wit, but of the many other dimensions of Ireland's hold on the United States. He wrote eloquently of those dimensions in "The American Irish"—about the saints and sinners who came to this country over the past century and more—and who did so much to make this land of their dreams a reality. They built our New England mills and cities, dug the canals and laid the railroad tracks that took America to the West. Even today, it is said, under every railroad tie, an Irishman is buried. And Bill Shannon told their story well, with the characteristic brilliance and sensitivity that have always been his trademark.

Writing that classic tale was a labor of love for Bill. But it was often frustrating too. I understand that at one point, Bill was ready to pack the project in. But Liz came to the rescue, saying: "Look, it's like a pile of wet laundry down in the cellar. You just have to pick it all up and iron it."

Later, in the 1970's, Ireland became not only history and heritage, but headlines and heartache too. "The troubles" had come again to that other land Bill loved. He was quick to comprehend the truth that all the news from Ireland was not fit to print. And so he traded in the editorial board of New York for the Embassy desk of Dublin.

At first, there was grumbling about Bill's nomination. The Foreign Service professionals, the big campaign contributors, and the thoroughbred horse-breeders all thought they owned the embassy. There was stiff competition for the post, and few observers gave much chance to the intellectual editorial writer from Brookline. But Bill got a little help from his friends. As a White House liaison man remarked in the spring of 1977, President Carter had no intention of stepping in between Bill Shannon, and Tip O'Neill and Ted Kennedy.

The Senate easily confirmed the nomination, because Bill was so obviously qualified for the job. After all, he reminded me, things hadn't changed that much from old Boston and the days of the "Last Hurrah," when you only had to know two things to do well in American foreign policy—Trieste belongs to Italy, and all Ireland must be free.

And so to his portfolio as reporter, columnist and author, Bill Shannon added the role of distinguished diplomat. I often thought he liked the latter best, because he liked the action most.

It is said that editorial writers are people who come down from the hills after the battle is over and shoot the wounded.

Now, I don't think of Bill Shannon that way, or Marty Nolan either.

But I know that when Bill Shannon stopped writing editorials in New York and started writing cables in Dublin, the State Department in Washington became swiftly and miraculously transformed into a much more even-handed posture on the Irish issue.

It is a tribute to the irresistible logic of Bill's diplomacy that when President Reagan took over from President Carter, he took over Bill Shannon's Irish policy too—and didn't change a thing. We are closer to peace in Northern Ireland today because of Bill Shannon, and closer to unity for all of Ireland too.

Finally, let me mention one other quality of Bill's that captivated Jack and Bobby and me and so many others who knew him. He was a gentle, loving friend, with a powerful, infectious sparkle in his eyes. It made all his soft-spoken words and precise pronunciations echo with insight and delight.

I've often thought that they wrote "When Irish Eyes Are Smiling" for people like Bill Shannon. And the words are an especially appropriate farewell now:

"When Irish eyes are smiling,
"It's like a morn in spring.
"In the lilt of Irish laughter,
"You can hear the angels sing.
"When Irish hearts are smiling,
"They'll steal your heart away."

You stole all our hearts away, Bill. We loved you, and we miss you.

WILLIAM V. SHANNON, COLUMNIST, FORMER ENVOY TO IRELAND; AT 61

(By Edgar J. Driscoll)

William V. Shannon, award-winning author and journalist and former United States ambassador to Ireland, died yesterday at University Hospital of lymphoma. He was 61 and lived in Brookline.

Mr. Shannon was ambassador to Ireland from 1977-81 during the Carter administration. After leaving Dublin in the spring of 1981, he joined the faculty of the University Professors program at Boston University, teaching a course on the American presidency and conducting graduate seminars in journalism.

From 1964 until his appointment by President Jimmy Carter, Mr. Shannon served on the editorial board of the New York Times, writing political and environmental editorials and columns for the paper.

Since the 1960s he also contributed articles to the Boston Globe. Beginning in 1981 he wrote a weekly column and editorials on domestic and foreign affairs. His last column appeared last week. In 1967, his biography of Robert F. Kennnedy, "The Heir Apparent," was serialized on the Globe's editorial pages.

Mr. Shannon wrote "The American Irish," a history of Irish immigration to this country, and "They Could Not Trust The King," a pictorial account of the Watergate hearings. He and Robert S. Allen wrote "Our Sovereign State" and the best-selling "The Truman Merry-Go-Round."

Mr. Shannon's articles also appeared in Commonweal, the Economist of London, the New Republic and the New York Times Magazine, among others.

Before joining the Times as an editorial writer in 1964, Mr. Shannon was a reporter for the New York Post. He received the New York Newspaper Guild's Page One Award for his coverage of the McCarthy-Army hearings in Washington in 1954.

He also won the Edward J. Meeman Award of the Scripps-Howard Foundation for conservation writing and the Gold Medal of the Eire Society. He was also a trustee of Clark University.

Mr. Shannon was born in Worcester of Irish immigrants. He graduated magna cum laude from Clark University in 1947 and the following year received a master's degree in American history from Harvard University. One of his professors, Arthur Schlesinger Jr., called him "the most brilliant student I ever had." Later he edited the Theodore Roosevelt Papers at MIT.

He was a fellow at the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions in Santa Barbara, Calif., in 1961-62. In 1969 he won an Alicia Patterson fellowship for journalists and spent the year in London observing the British Parliament.

He was a member of the Tavern Club of Boston, the Century Club of New York, the American Antiquarian Society, the American Historical Association, the Massachusetts Historical Society and Phi Beta Kappa Roman Catholic Club. He also served on the boards of the American Ireland Fund, the American Irish Arts Exchange, Cooperation North and the American Council of Bishops.

Mr. Shannon leaves his wife, Elizabeth (McNelly); three sons, Liam, Christopher and David Shannon, all of Brookline; a brother, John, and two sisters, Mary Willett and Clare Graham, all of Worcester.

A funeral Mass will be said at noon Friday in St. Aidan's Church, Brookline.

WILLIAM V. SHANNON

For those in the opinion business, he was the finest role model one could have. His columns bristled with strong, clearly expressed views, yet in person his kindness, elegance and easy demeanor charmed all who met him. He was a gentleman and a professional who made the art of disagreeing agreeable.

William V. Shannon, who died of cancer yesterday at University Hospital, was more than that. As the US ambassador to Ireland, he represented the best of Irish-American thought and culture. Never has Washington been represented in Dublin with more grace, charm and passionate understanding than when Bill Shannon was ambassador. In 1977, President Jimmy Carter, to his credit, appointed a nontraditional ambassador—a member of The New York Times editorial board, an intellectual, an academic and an author. Shannon's book, "The American Irish, in America," has never been equaled.

In the 1950s, when he covered the rise of McCarthyism for the New York Post, Shannon reflected the common-sense values of Worcester, where he grew up. As his career in newspapers developed, he avoided the occupational hazard of cynicism and became more optimistic about democracy. His political philosophy was similar to that of the late Sen. Henry Jackson, who said, "I'm a liberal, but I'm not a damned fool about it."

Shannon's erudition and unfailing courtesy won admiration in New York and Washington, but the kitchen-table values of Worcester provided lasting satisfaction. He was devoted to his wife, his sons and the Boston Red Sox.

In Ireland, his diplomatic abilities and love of the country helped elevate the Irish-American dialogue. After his diplomatic service in 1981, he taught at Boston University and wrote for the Globe.

Readers of this newspaper will miss the clarity, insight and passion he brought to his writings. We will miss his sense of fairness and decency, his wit, charm and high standards. Bill Shannon was above all a craftsman, as he showed when he wrote his last column last week. He took great pride in his column, but no greater than we did in printing it.

WILLIAM SHANNON DIES AT 61; WAS JOURNALIST, AMBASSADOR

William V. Shannon, 61, the U.S. ambassador to Ireland during the Carter administration who also was a scholar and a journalist who had distinguished careers at the New York Post, the New York Times and the Boston Globe, died of cancer Sept. 27 at a hospital in Boston.

Mr. Shannon was a Washington correspondent and columnist with the New York Post from 1951 to 1964. He then joined the editorial board of The New York Times. He remained there until 1977, when he went to Ireland as ambassador.

In 1981 he returned to this country. Since then he had been a contributing columnist to The Boston Globe and a teacher of journalism and a course on the American presidency at Boston University.

While serving in Dublin, his common sense and command of the language made him a good representative, encouraging friends and disarming critics. His abilities were particularly in evidence during an awkward episode that occurred while he served there.

Through error, a private letter written by the cultural affairs officer at the U.S. Embassy was released to a Dublin newspaper. It contained many observations that were critical of the Irish and it became the topic of the day. In one passage the Irish were said to be "a people with too much human nature—violent and compassionate—for their own good." In another it was said that Ireland had "food and climate well suited to each other: dull."

The Irish prime minister, the Irish Tourism Council and the Irish Hotels Federation expressed outrage. Mr. Shannon coolly and deftly met the crisis with the following statement: "The Irish are famous for their sense of humor, and I think I shall have to rely on it in this instance."

A resident of Brookline, Mass., Mr. Shannon was born in Worcester, Mass. He graduated magna cum laude from Clark University in 1947 and received a master's degree in American history from Harvard University. He served briefly on the faculty of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and helped edit the letters of Theodore Roosevelt before moving to Washington in 1949. He was a free-lance writer until joining The New York Post.

Over the years, he contributed articles and reviews to many of this country's leading publications. He had covered the hearings on Sen. Joseph R. McCarthy (R-Wis.) for The New York Post and became an authority on McCarthy's brand of anticommunism. He also was a student of the famous Sacco-Vanzetti case in the 1920s, in which two anarchists were executed in Massachusetts.

Mr. Shannon also wrote several books, including "They Could Not Trust the King," which is about the Watergate case and was published by Macmillan in 1974, and "The American Irish," published by Macmillan in 1964. He was a member of the American-Irish Foundation.

Survivors include his wife of 27 years, the former Elizabeth McNelly, and three sons, Liam, Christopher, and David Shannon, all of Brookline, and a brother, John Shannon, and two sisters, Mary Willett and Clare Graham, all of Worcester.

WILLIAM V. SHANNON DIES AT 61; AUTHOR AND FORMER AMBASSADOR

(By Glenn Fowler)

William V. Shannon, an journalist and author who was Ambassador to Ireland in the Carter Administration, died of lymphoma Tuesday at University Hospital in Boston. He was 61 years old and lived in Brookline, Mass.

Mr. Shannon, the son of an Irish immigrant, had spent more than a quarter of a century working for newspapers as a reporter, editorial writer and columnist when he was chosen by President Carter in 1977 as envoy to Dublin. He had written "The American Irish," a history of Irish immigrants and their progeny in the United States that was published by Macmillan in 1964.

Before and after his diplomatic service, Mr. Shannon devoted himself to journalism and scholarship. He was a Washington correspondent for The New York Post from 1951 to 1964 and an editorial writer for The New York Times from 1964 until he went to Ireland.

LAST COLUMN A WEEK AGO

When he returned from his ambassadorship in 1981 he joined the faculty of Boston University, teaching a course on the American Presidency and conducting graduate seminars in journalism. He also wrote for The Boston Globe on foreign and domestic affairs.

Mr. Shannon's fatal illness was diagnosed last March but he continued to teach and write until this fall, when he went on medical leave from the university. His last column for The Globe appeared a week ago today.

Mr. Shannon's "experience in foreign affairs and as a journalist brought a very high level of achievement to bear in his classes," said John Silbver, president of Boston University. "He was an inspiration to our students, a stimulation to our colleagues and a productive and witty colleague."

Most of Mr. Shannon's writing dealt with American political affairs. In 1950 he collaborated with Robert S. Allen on "The Truman Merry-Go-Round." Published by Vanguard, it was a collection of vignettes about life in Washington that took a salty view of President Truman.

WRITINGS FOR PERIODICALS

He wrote "The Heir Apparent: Robert Kennedy and the Struggle for Power" (Macmillan, 1967), less than a year before Senator Kennedy was assassinated while seeking the Presidency.

Mr. Shannon was a frequent contributor to current-affairs periodicals, including The Economist, Commonweal, Harper's, The Atlantic Monthly, New Statesman, The New Republic and Partisan Review. Among his honors was a Page One Award from The New York Newspaper Guild for coverage of national affairs for The New York Post.

Mr. Shannon was born in Worcester, Mass., one of five children of a carpenter who emigrated from Ireland in 1910. He received a bachelor's degree from Clark University in Worcester and a master's degree in history from Harvard.

From 1951 to 1957 he was bureau chief in Washington for The New York Post and for the next seven years he wrote a national-affairs column for The Post. When he moved to The Times in 1964 he wrote on state and local matters as well as national affairs.

Mr. Shannon is survived by his wife, the former Elizabeth McNelly; three sons, Liam, Christopher and David, all of Brookline; a brother, John, of Worcester, and two sisters, Mary Willett and Clare Graham, both of Worcester.

A funeral mass is to be said at noon tomorrow at St. Aidan's Roman Catholic Church in Brookline.

Letter to the Editor

"SHANNON EPITOMIZED THE BEST OF JOURNALISM"

(By Keith C. Burris, Associate Editor, the Toledo Blade, Toledo, OH)

I never met William Shannon, but when I read an advisory on one of the wire services that Shannon's last column had been transmitted before he had died of cancer, it gave me a jolt. I actually felt that I had lost a friend. Certainly, journalists throughout the nation lost a role model. Shannon epitomized the best of American opinion journalism.

I had routinely seized his column each week to read for my own pleasure and edification.

One of the nice things about writers and writing, even the poor cousins in journalism, is that no one can really know how far a writer's words extend, nor can anyone judge the depth of the words' impression. The first Shannon column I remember clipping and keeping was called "The Challenge Beyond Nihilism"; it appeared in The New York Times during the presidential campaign of 1976. The column was the work of a serious man in a trivial time and a too-often trivial profession.

Shannon wrote principally about politics. I don't think of that as incidental duty: politics is important both in itself, as a human activity, and as a force in history and civilization. Yet many political writers act as if their craft is trivial, as if depth and ponderousness are the same qualities. Like few others, Shannon thought about politics as he chronicled it.

He was a liberal, though an old-fashioned one, perhaps more a liberal Catholic than a liberal Democrat, and he could turn a phrase, but his first commitment seemed to be to thought, analysis and opinion that might shed light. I cannot think of a Shannon column that was merely cute or built upon a foundation of one-liners.

I got to know Shannon a little through correspondence. And I got to know a couple of his friends who shared both their admiration and facts about Shannon's life. One was William Clancy, the late Catholic priest, preacher and Commonweal editor. Another was Eugene McCarthy, the nonconformist Irish-American elder statesman. Both took Shannon seriously because he was a pundit and a historian of ideas.

I had become fond of the man strictly through words, his columns. This seems rare, Victorian, almost precious—but one may hope it is not. The written word and those who take care of words still matter.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR—"ON THE FRONT LINES WITH FORM, SUBSTANCE"

(By Jack Garvey, Newburyport, MA)

Like many teachers of college writing, I'm always looking for current articles with content relevant to young people and with form and style that set examples.

For as often as I've discussed William V. Shannon's columns with my classes, I've wondered if I should send him part of my paycheck or notes of appreciation. I'm ashamed that I did neither and that it's now too late.

As far as I know, Shannon was the only columnist who recognized the foremost threat to America and treated it as a recurrent theme. In his own words:

"The United States today has a popular culture that is at war against the nation's children and youth."

While the rest continually scribble about sideshow skirmishes or makeshift miracles and party-line patriotism, the front line seems vacant without him.

Until that changes, "the coarsening and corrupting of the nation's youth will continue," as Shannon warned in 1987, "and America's decline will be irreversible."

BILL SHANNON REMEMBERED

(By Maureen Connelly)

In a send off as would befit a Celtic chieftain or a Clare Shenachie, William Shannon, former ambassador to Ireland in the Carter administration, was laid to rest on September's last day. From the calling hours the eve before at his family's home in Brookline to the noon Requiem Mass at his parish church named after a 7th century Irishman, it was a traditional Irish funeral.

One of five children born in 1927 to parents from County Clare who came to Worcester in 1910, Shannon was educated at Clark and Harvard universities. At the latter, historian Arthur Schlesinger considered him to be his "most brilliant student."

Before his ambassadorship, he spent 25 years as a journalist with the New York Post and the New York Times. After, he was a professor at Boston University and a columnist for the Boston Globe. At the time of his death, from lymphoma, he was co-authoring, with Senator Kennedy, a remembrance of John and Robert Kennedy."

"Of all the friends I inherited from Jack, Bill was one of the best and certainly the brightest," said Kennedy in the opening of his eulogy at St. Aidan's. And, after reminiscing on their friendship and love for Ireland, especially her stories, he recited in almost a whisper the lyrics of "When Irish Eyes Are Smiling."

Shannon's affection for Ireland and her people also was recalled by Ambassador Patrick MacKernan in his eulogy. Just as the Irish have never forgotten JFK's visit there in '63, they will never forget the Shannon years, said MacKernan, and the Rev. Leonard Copenrath, pastor of St. Aidan's, in his homily paused to point out the font where this country's first Irish-Catholic President was baptised in 1917.

Two of Shannon's newspaper pals, Martin Nolan of The Boston Globe and John Oakes of The New York Times, also offered eulogies. Both from the pulpit and in print two days before, Nolan praised Shannon's "kitchen-table values of Worcester," his devotion "to his wife, his sons, and the Boston Red Sox," and his "craftsmanship."

Referring to Shannon's last column, published five days before he died, Nolan remarked, "The passion in it resonated as eloquently as a speech before the gallows of a young Irish patriot."

And Oakes, speaking in behalf of Shannon's widow Elizabeth and their three sons, recalled his last words: "Violence is a sin for which there can never be any justification."

When asked by this Echo writer how they best remember Bill Shannon, Hub-Hibernians all were in agreement as to his intelligence, integrity, humanity and humor. John Daley, president of the Eire Society when Shannon received its gold medal, remembers their conversation on that occasion, April 18, 1975.

It touched on Ireland as well as America's history, the location of the dinner (it was the first time the Eire Society had booked the Harvard Club), and their first roots. Daley discovered that night that his aunt, Helen Lombard, was Shannon's second grade teacher in Worcester.

Mary Tierney, also a former Eire Society president and a columnist with the old Boston Herald, remembers first meeting Shannon in Rome, "where we were both on assignment. We were introduced by Bishop Minihan." To Tierney, Shannon was "a rare combination of journalist and diplomat who excelled in both professions."

Her sentiments were shared by Bill O'Donnell, the former Boston Irish Echo's editor. "We have lost a good friend and a strong advocate of peace and justice in Ireland," said O'Donnell.

Bill McNally, Boston director of the American Ireland Fund, will never forget how Shannon, "single-handedly, selected, after reviewing each entry and interviewing each applicant, the American Ireland Fund's annual literary award winner."

Maeve Finley, one of the Fund's first directors, will always think of him "as a gentleman, and a scholar. We will miss his humanity and his positive thinking."

The Consul General of Ireland in Boston, Brendan Scannell, will continue to consider Bill Shannon as Ireland's champion. "His reputation as an intellectual powerhouse, his kindness and his humanity is legendary in Dublin . . . He was a statesman who unselfishly served two nations, Ireland and America, proudly and with distinction."

And this writer cannot help but ask if senators or scholars, editors and educators, family and friends will ever see his like again.

BILL SHANNON: A COLUMNIST WHOSE READERS WERE ALSO HIS FAMILY

(By Elizabeth Shannon)

On Sept. 30, Bill Shannon's family, friends and colleagues—400 in all—bade him farewell. As I spoke to many of them, I realized that another and very important "family" in his life was not able to perform the rituals of saying goodbye—his readers.

Bill had been a newspaperman all his adult life, briefly writing news stories, which he didn't like and didn't do well, then switching to columns and editorials, which he loved and did very well.

His first ambition was to be an academic, and some of his friends thought his move into journalism was a strange choice for a scholar and historian, but he didn't think of it as strange at all. He wrote to inform, to teach and to provoke thoughtful political dialogue. His column was his classroom, his readers his students.

Unfailingly gentle and kind in person, the passion and ferocity of his nature in the defense of democracy and honest, good government turned his prose into muscular and courageous attacks on men and events he distrusted. He knew no fear when he chose a target, and his typewriter keys would pound out a drumbeat of cogent, forceful sentences, each one building in beautiful, clean logic to the climax of his argument.

He loved politics the way other men love golf. He would gear up to a national election like a runner warming up for a sprint, looking over candidates early in the race.

Countless evenings at the table, after we had finished dinner, he would sit with a pen and the back of a used envelope, writing lists of states and their votes, comparing them with the previous four years, and the four years before that. Then he would shake his head and say: "He'll never make it." And for him, that was the end of that candidate. He was seldom wrong.

He loved the years of correspondence he had with his readers. From Hawaii right across the country, they wrote to him with regularity; angry at a stand he took, bemused at what they considered a deviation from his liberal stance, pleased with a judgment that matched their own.

He answered them all: the man who wrote in circles of red ink on the back of a grubby postcard, the woman from North Carolina who signed all her letters with a lipstick kiss, the thoughtful attorney from Oklahoma who wrote regularly because she said Bill was the only person she had to "talk politics" with.

Only once did he become the target of vandalism because of his views, and that was when he wrote a column disagreeing with Margaret Thatcher's decision to invade the Falklands. After the passion of so many years of political controversy, it did not loom large as an issue with him, but there are those weeks when you have to write about something.

There is always someone in the world who feels very strongly about an issue, no matter what it is, and the night that column appeared, our car was spray-painted with large red letters: "Up with Mrs. Thatcher. Down with the Falklands."

The policeman who came to take a look at it shook his head in bemusement: "We haven't had many protests about the Falklands," he said. Bill just loved it.

Bill wrote only two personal columns. One was for the New York Post, when he told his readers that he wouldn't appear for a month because he was going on his honeymoon. The second time he was asked by The New York Times Magazine to write a column about values we instill in our children. As always, we talked about the article before he wrote it; there was no trouble about our having a united front on those issues, but I, with our children still so young, finally said: "I'm not going to be a part of your telling people how to raise their children; we haven't raised ours yet." So he added a footnote, saying I had disassociated myself with the article.

He received more mail on that piece than anything he ever wrote. The majority of it was from readers who felt supported by seeing goals for their own children reinforced in print by another parent. Now, 16 years later, I remove the footnote. His values—as with so many of his political judgments—proved right.

He dictated his last column from his bed nine days before he died. His sons and I want his readers to know how much they meant to him.

THE AMBASSADOR GOES HOME

(By James Finn)

When William V. Shannon was buried from St. Aidan's Church in Brookline, Massachusetts on September 30, the many strands of his professional and personal life were brought together. First, the celebrant informed us that St. Aidan was a seventh-century Irish missionary and it was in this same church that John F. Kennedy had been baptized. During the funerary tributes paid to Bill Shannon, Senator Edward Kennedy revealed that a principal reason that President John Kennedy had received the warm reception he did when he visited Ireland was that many of the words he delivered had been composed by William Shannon. Bill himself was later to receive high praise and much affection from the Irish when, under the Carter administration, he served as a very engaged and imaginative U.S. ambassador to Ireland.

Other tributes came from colleagues who knew Bill as a journalist, historian, columnist, editorial writer, and teacher. John Oakes not only spoke of his deep admiration for Bill's professional integrity as editorial writer for the New York Times but of his own long friendship. Noting Bill's fastidiousness in dress and decorum, he remembered waiting nervously to drive Bill to the hospital where his wife, Elizabeth, was preparing to give birth to one of the children. Bill was lingering in front of his closet. "One must be careful what tie to wear when one is going to have a baby," Bill explained. John Oakes then read the loving tribute that Elizabeth Shannon and Liam, Christopher, and David paid to Bill as husband and father.

No one could capture in brief comments anyone as brilliant and accomplished as Bill Shannon. But there did emerge from testimonials delivered at Bill's funeral Mass a sense of his integrity, compassion, wit, elegance, loyalty, and appropriate political detachment. These qualities were evident in his prose as they were in his person.

My own memories of Bill are closely entwined with Commonweal where, Bill said, he made among the editors three very close friends, John Cogley, William Clancy, and myself. I remember Bill coming into the office to write a column and in short order turning out a highly polished, thoughtful piece. An unusual but not a unique achievement. Bill's piece, however, was studded with dates and statistics that most writers have retrieved only from reference books, but which Bill easily found in his remarkably capacious memory. I learned early on not to dispute historical facts; had he questioned it, I think I would have come to doubt even my own birth date.

Bill's deep political interest and insight, his vast memory, and his elegant prose made every book, every article he wrote a pleasure to read and a formidable challenge to those who held contesting views. What made his writing of more than the day's or month's passing interest was that it was grounded in a deep moral sense. Recalling Lord Acton in a piece he wrote for Commonweal over thirty years ago (April 16, 1954), he referred to "academicians who in their eagerness to be fair and to present history in all its many-sided complexity evade altogether the historian's ultimate responsibility for making moral judgment on men and events."

Bill did not evade that responsibility. For example, long before final proof rolled in and before it was popular to say so, Bill declared that "Spiro T. Agnew is not qualified for the high office he seeks." Even when Bill's moral judgments were not explicit, they permeated his political analysis and historical commentary.

Those who knew him primarily through his writing will miss a kind of moral/political analysis that is always rare and today much needed. For those whose lives were closely bound with Bill's, his death leaves a gap that must be permanent. And for those who could join in the message of the funeral Mass celebrating the passage of Bill Shannon to another life, we can truly say: our prayers go with you.

[From the National Review, Oct. 28, 1988]

WILLIAM V. SHANNON, RIP

The disease of liberalism in our time resides in the fact that it has no enemies to the left. Anything goes—Castro, Ortega, Maurice Bishop, Angela Davis, Jesse Jackson, the Salvadoran guerrillas, and, well, you name it, we don't want to.

William V. Shannon, who died of lymphoma on September 27, at age 61, was not a liberal of that round-heeled sort. His roots were in an earlier liberalism that actually made distinctions, hated and despised totalitarianism, and was unabashedly patriotic. NR certainly disagreed with Mr. Shannon on various issues concerning the welfare state, but never on the basic issues of liberty.

Throughout his adult life, Mr. Shannon was a distinguished journalist, writing for the New York Post and later joining the editorial board of the New York Times. He was something of a professional Irishman, his most impressive book being The American Irish (1964), a fine account of that subculture. Perhaps Jimmy Carter's best appointment was Mr. Shannon as ambassador to Ireland in 1977, where he served with great distinction.

He wound up at Boston University, teaching courses in journalism and on the American Presidency. His last column, for the Boston Globe, was written a week before his death. He was a journalist of honor, and will be missed.

[From the Boston Irish News, Nov. 1988]

REMEMBERING WILLIAM V. SHANNON

In the preface to The American Irish which was published in 1964, barely one year after the assassination of John F. Kennedy—the symbol of Irish success and assimilation in America—William V. Shannon recalled the reaction of Joseph P. Kennedy to being called an Irishman by a Boston newspaper.

"I was born here. My children were born here. What the hell do I have to do to be called an American?" Kennedy snapped.

Shannon was well suited to examining that question in its social and historical context. He was the son of Irish immigrants, yet Harvard educated; a first class newspaperman working with elite American publications. As a young reporter he clashed with McCarthyism, one of the uglier manifestations of the Irish experience in America.

Shannon certainly knew his Irish heritage, and took pride in it, but he was fully and confidently assimilated. The very title of his first book The American Irish, leaves no doubt as to where his primary loyalty lay.

Indeed, one of the major themes in The American Irish is the competition between progressive and conservative values within the Irish community in America, something that had, and has, more to do with the nature of American rather than Irish politics.

Even in the early sixties, he was alert to a trend that became more pronounced in the seventies and eighties—the Irish shift away from the Democrats toward the Republicans. His grasp of history provided an early guide to the changes, many of them wrenching, that faced the Irish in America.

Yet he charted and challenged the idols of his tribe graciously, with style and gifted intellect.

Given such an array of talents and confidence it is no surprise that the most influential book on the Irish experience in America began not with praise but by addressing an internal tension and by examining a question of ethnic identity. "To describe one group of Americans" he wrote "in terms of their ancestry and background is not to say that they are any less American for what they did and are. Rather, it is an effort to show what kind of Americans they are and why their history took the form that it did."

The scholarship, diplomacy and journalistic writing of William V. Shannon, 61, who died of cancer on September 27th, established new standards of excellence in American Irish relations.

As American Ambassador to Ireland from 1977 to 1981, during the Carter Administration, he understood the country and its situation. His diplomacy was astute and understated. He knew how to read subtle and complex issues and how to best represent them, to the benefit of American and Irish interests.

His Ambassadorship marked a new threshold of quality by which subsequent Ambassadors are judged.

In his journalistic work, Shannon, a Boston Globe columnist since 1981, and a former editorial writer with the New York Times, showed insight and moderation, particularly when writing about Ireland. He used no rash words, his assessments were measured yet substantial and his reasoning was always based on fact and realism. His presence at The Globe clearly contributed to that paper's above-average coverage of Irish affairs.

In The American Irish Shannon wrote "I happen to think disagreement is . . . a good thing. As a columnist who has to make up his mind several times a week on a broad range of public issues, some of them in bitter dispute, I have always taken comfort from the old Irish proverb, 'Contention is better than loneliness.' "

As diplomat, scholar and journalist Shannon knew how to be contentious and provocative. However, he was always professional, courteous and responsible. His was a rare combination. He succeeded in not only making his mark, over and over again, but in always commanding the greatest of respect.

American Irish dialogue is poorer without him.

MEMORIAL MASS FOR HON. WILLIAM V. SHANNON, CHURCH OF THE SACRED HEART, DONNYBROOK, DUBLIN, IRELAND, NOVEMBER 12, 1988

REMARKS BY DR. GARRET FITZGERALD, T.D., FORMER PRIME MINISTER OF IRELAND

Twenty-five years ago our country was starting to emerge from a crisis of self-confidence induced by the failures of the fifties. At that moment John F. Kennedy, then in the last Summer of his life, came to us. I was present as a journalist in a corner of the public gallery in Dail Eireann, listening to the words he spoke. They were well-chosen words: words woven with skill; words that moved deeply those who heard them in that House, and, through television, those who heard them in their homes across Ireland. Words that spoke of the President's pride of ancestry; words that renewed our faith in ourselves—and in the capacity of this small people to play a role, small indeed, but disproportionate to our size, on the global stage.

It had been to Bill Shannon that John Kennedy had turned to help him to express with sureness of touch and with sensitivity his feelings on an occasion which for him, as for us, was one of unique significance.

For Bill Shannon was a man of two countries: proud of his own America, and deeply attached to Ireland, he bridged what, truth to tell, are two very different worlds. A gifted writer, he had the capacity to express this understanding in language that was evocative in both cultures.

That he cared deeply about Ireland was evident in everything he wrote about this country. And what he wrote was always directed towards a constructive end. At times, like all of us, he was tempted to despair of a way being found out of the tragic trap into which history has led this island, and especially its Northern part, with whose problems Liz, like Bill, became so deeply involved. But at a fundamental level, Bill recognized that in seeking to sort out the lethal debris of that history, we must above all be persistent and never-tiring in our pursuit of peace.

There was, in logic, only one way in which Bill's unique talent and commitment could have an opportunity for full expression, only one way in which his love for these two countries, Ireland and America, could be fulfilled; by his appointment as Ambassador of the United States to Ireland. Of course, it might never have happened; such matters are frequently decided by forces other than logic. But it did happen.

So for four years Bill and Liz, and their chidren, became fully a part of our lives. With style, with gaiety, and above all with a deep sense of personal involvement in this country, for which he cared so deeply, Bill represented America to Ireland, and Ireland to America.

And it was Bill and Liz. Together they threw themselves with equal enthusiasm into the life of this land; derived from this experience an equal stimulus; gained amongst all who came to know them equal affection.

When they came to leave us at the end of Bill's too-brief term, he told me that he had a book that he wished to give me. It had just been given to him by a book-seller, but he felt that I should have it. It was a copy of a literary magazine of the early 1920s that had been presented to my father early in 1922 by the foreign press corps in Dublin with whom my father had worked as Director of Publicity of the Dail government from 1919 to 1921. The names inscribed in it include many notable figures in journalistic history. At some point it had left the possession of our family, and Bill, a journalist himself, felt it should return whence it had come. I value it today, on Bill's account, as on that of my father.

I was fortunate to have the chance to see Bill a few days before he died. Ill though he was, two things were quite unchanged: his concern for Ireland and his sense of humour.

We thank Liz for this opportunity to celebrate the man we knew, and loved.

REMARKS BY SEAMUS HEANEY

"Every idle word that a man shall speak, he shall render an account of it on the day of judgment." When that indignant pronouncement was first made, idle speech still tended to be confined to the lips of the idle speaker. The technology of proliferation had not been invented. Our planet had not yet been swathed in an endless issue of printouts from ceefax machines and word-processors or of handouts from press agents and promoters. Human consciousness was still in closer contact with the Word that was in the beginning. Even those who abused words had a more pristine sense of the word as a bond, and a more inescapable sense that a word abused was the equivalent of an abused trust.

William Shannon was a man who never broke that covenant with the first word. His rectitude was closely bound up with his reticence, and he rebuked the usual idleness of political and journalistic language by the unusual integrity of his own linguistic disciplines. On this occasion, therefore, I wish to praise him as a fellow member of the guild of writers, one of the wardens of the word, those compelled by what W.B. Yeats once called "the fascination of what's difficult."

That Bill would not have counted himself a literary contender does not mean that he did not perceive himself as a natural peer of the pen-people. That is where his heart lay. One rich consequence of this was the way he extended his diplomatic mission, when he lived here as Ambassador, beyond the usual political and commercial circles in order to include the cultural and literary community. That his wife Liz should have been his companion and co-adjutant in this work of hospitality was a happy circumstance both for him and for us. But here I salute, as a member of the aos dána, both the contemporary institution and the ancient sect. I salute in particular Bill's own deliberate, authoritative and typically soundless achievement in amplifying the scope and meaning of the American ambassador's role. By exercising his prerogatives as a public representative and not reneging on his predelictions as an individual intelligence, he was able to fortify the good bonds between the Republic of Ireland and the Republic of the United States within the larger jurisdiction of human civilization itself.

These sonorous words are not in this case idle. For almost two decades Bill worked as consultant, adviser and co-ordinator in the administration of the American Irish Foundation's Literary Award. He was assiduous, discreet and punctiliously fair-minded in this area of responsibility, and, as is often the case with people who work selflessly for the greater good of other writers, he was insufficiently thanked by them. Yet his lack of vanity was such that he could watch without resentment while people took as their due that which he had tactfully and considerately put in their way.

I respected immensely that equanimity of his because it arose from an unfooled and clear-eyed sense of how things really were. His long years as a journalist had transformed a natural vigilance into a mature judiciousness. Whether it was at a dinner table, where his direct gaze and direct talk could establish an outpost of calm in a hurry of blather, or on a leader page where his devotion to principle vied unyieldingly with his realistic sense of what was possible in places as far apart as Boston and Belfast—in all these cases, as he followed the line of his thought to a lucid and pondered conclusion, we benefited from the presence among us of one so incapable of vulgarity or triviality.

The loss of such good intellectual example weakens us all; but even more we are hurt by the personal blow of his early death. In Dublin and then in Boston, Marie and I had got used to the good disposition and wily accurate point of view he brought into play in any company. As host or as guest, he had the capacity to contribute his gifts to the company without ever parading them or himself. And he could be, among friends, as merry and tart as he was tactful.

I am sorry that he did not live to see the American publication of a book of mine called "The Government of the Tongue." This is not just because of the play to be made of my trespassing on his area as a professor of government; but more seriously, because he lived out to the full the two possible meanings I intended by that title. On the one hand, Bill Shannon's utterance was restrained and governed by the light of conscience, justice and charity. On the other hand, because of those very restraints, his utterance, when it did come, had a real governing force and rightness about it. So, when he stood in the judgment place, the Word that was in the beginning must have recognized in him somebody who had kept the faith. Somebody who had put the word of truth, in all its manifestations and demands, at the centre of his exemplary life.

REMARKS BY KEITH KYLE

We had been friends for thirty-four years. I can remember as if it were yesterday coming out of the office of the Economist in the National Press Building in Washington and running into him in the corridor. With that slight initial diffidence which I came to know so well, he invited me to lunch as he had some question to ask me about Britain. What I was able to tell him occupied us through the hors d'oeuvre. From that point on I entered into his debt as the beneficiary of his immense erudition as a student of the history and contemporary practice of American politics.

Bill had originally been a professional historian, working on the complete edition of the letters of Theodore Roosevelt—and one could readily see that he had the gifts of scholarship for such a task. But the fascination he had for live contemporary politics, first displayed in his writing about Massachusetts, brought him inevitably to Washington. He was working for the New York Post when I got to know him; he afterwards moved to the New York Times. We were two young men with a passion to learn and digest all that could be found out in a city totally dedicated to the arts and artifices of government. In Bill, I had found not only a natural teacher but a most estimable companion.

Bill Shannon was a man of quality and a man of discernment. I cannot remember his ever making an ill-considered remark, though he often made very penetrating ones. He had about him a certain old-world courtliness of manner that made him a most considerate host. And he was very funny, with a merry wit that was not staged but sprang naturally from the context of what he was saying. He never paraded his erudition—that slight diffidence of manner which I had noted at our first meeting did not mislead. It was a clue to his personality. But one felt a tremendous sense of reassurance that that great reservoir of information was available.

He always seemed to me in the worst of days—and there were many of these when I was first in Washington, because this was the time when the most familiar name in public life was that of Joseph McCarthy—to see the scene steadily and to see it whole. But his anger when roused by a public wrong flared through the paragraphs of his powerfully directed prose. He felt deeply, passionately, about such things as corruption, vicious demagoguery and corporate sleaze, but his awareness of and alertness to these hurtful features never made him despair of the political process itself; indeed all his work was a struggle against such an attitude. "It would be tragic if Watergate produced only a new anti-politics, a more pervasive distrust of public life and everyone in it," Bill wrote at the end of a book called "They Could Not Trust the King." "Feebler democracies," he went on, "have died from passivity and easy cynicism . . . Americans can find no safety in privacy and despair."

As a writer, Bill was at his best when he could combine the vivid and realistic portraiture of the individuals involved in a political story with his gift for identifying the public issues that underlay it. He never forgot that politics is a very human activity, sometimes stretching individuals to the limit and beyond, and having therefore much to say about the general human condition. He had a gift for the apt phrase. With our shared passion for American politics, we would often meet at the end of the day to exchange impressions. One day, when I had been observing the scene, full of pathos and banality, in a congressional hearing room where one of Senator McCarthy's imitators had been in action, I found that Bill, suffering from a severe chill, had been unable to go out. I had been describing the scene in some detail and readily agreed that he should make use of it in the column he still had to write that night. Next day I read his piece with special interest. The details were there just as I had described them, but the whole was transformed and given the authentic Bill Shannon stamp by some ringing, searing phrases. One I still remember. This particular committee was termed "the shrinking room of American democracy." The words pinned the proceedings to the wall, with the arrow still quivering.

Bill wrote quite regularly for the Economist, allowing me to go to other parts of the country confident that the Washington scene would be ably covered. Behind the anonymity of the paper, some of the most powerful reports out of Washington came from his typewriter. The friendship born of these years continued after I had left Washington. We met as often as the Atlantic would permit. We had both been bachelors in those early days; now it became a friendship of two families. Earlier this year my wife and I got to see something of Christopher when he was attending classes in England, and we realised from his conversation what a positive influence Bill was on his sons.

Bill had a year in England studying our political system and, of course, after his years on the editorial board of the New York Times, he was appointed Ambassador to Dublin. It is not for me as neither an American nor an Irishman to say much about his diplomatic record. Yet as a person who loves and knows a little about Ireland and stayed with Liz and Bill at Phoenix Park several times, I can say what you all in fact know: that his involvement with Ireland was no matter of mere St. Patrick's Day sentimentalism. His best-known book was on the American Irish. His interest in and concern with the land of his parents long preceded his public service here and only ceased with his death.

After diplomacy, Bill Shannon went back to the academic world as a Professor at Boston University. In a sense his life had come full circle. But he retained his regular links with journalism in his leaders and in his weekly column in the Boston Globe, some of which he used to send to me so as to keep me straight on American affairs. His popular course on the American Presidency will have been no ivory-tower pursuit. He used to ring me up from the Globe when he was going to write something about British politics. The last time was in July. He was animated, full of fun, shrewd in his comments, looking forward to the visit he was shortly paying and did in fact pay to Ireland. We do not have so many men of his quality that we can afford to have them taken away.

DEATH OF MR. BILL SHANNON, DIPLOMAT AND HISTORIAN

The death took place in a Boston hospital last evening of William V. Shannon, the historian, Pulitzer Prize-winning journalist and former ambassador to Ireland.

Mr. Shannon, who was Professor of History in Boston University and a member of the editorial board of the Boston Globe, served in Ireland from 1977 to 1981. A former newspaperman with the New York Times, Mr. Shannon in recent years has been writing from the United States for the Irish Press in Dublin.

Born in Worcester, Massachusetts, 61 years ago, both his parents came from Clare. His father, Patrick Shannon, was from Doolin on the west coast and his mother, Honora McNamara, from the little port of Ballyvaughan, further north.

Both had emigrated out of sheer necessity. His mother joined her brother, who had a grocery store in Worcester while her boyfriend, who followed her out, got a job locally as a carpenter.

Although Bill Shannon always regarded himself as totally American, he was undoubtedly influenced by what was a very Irish household and was well used to hearing patriotic ballads and Irish music on Saturday nights. But because his father died when he was only four, he grew up with little knowledge of the political troubles in Ireland.

His deep knowledge of Irish history and culture he was to acquire at college and during four long visits to Ireland before he became ambassador.

He wrote a book about the American Irish, became a director of the American Irish Foundation and spoke about Ireland most notably in 1975 to the Eire Society of Boston when, in a long dissertation, he sought recognition from the British that Ireland was one nation, indivisible and that all of Ulster belonged under the legal sovereignty of the Republic.

"Northern Ireland is not a country in itself, but a small fragment torn from the living body of Ireland where now the last act of Ireland's long struggle for independence is being played out," he said.

When he became ambassador and was reminded of this speech, he was quick to recall to reporters President Carter's dictum that there was no simple solution to the Northern question.

He further explained that at the time he was in a mood of deep pessimism; it was just after the collapse of the power-sharing executive in the North and the election of the delegates to the Convention which everyone knowledgeable on Irish affairs knew would be stillborn.

Shortly after arriving in Dublin he was highly critical of the American Northern Aid Committee, which he said was a Provisional front organisation. He spoke of the bitter old men of Noraid, "all men in their 70s who fought in this country in the 20s with de Valera."

"I think that something like 10,000 supporters of the losing side in the Civil War emigrated to the U.S., most of them in and around New York. They are still fighting the battles of the 20s."

A graduate of Clarke University, Mr. Shannon did post-graduate work at Harvard before getting his first job at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. His academic friends were surprised when he opted for journalism, and surprised as he himself was when Tip O'Neill phoned him one day in May 1977 to tell him he had been appointed ambassador to Ireland.

He is survived by his wife Elizabeth and three sons, Liam, Christopher and David.

MEMORIAL MASS FOR U.S. ENVOY WILLIAM SHANNON

A Memorial Mass for the late William V. Shannon, former U.S. Ambassador to Ireland, who died on September 27th, was celebrated by Cardinal O Fiaich at the Sacred Heart Church, Donnybrook, yesterday in the presence of a large congregation.

Eulogies to the former ambassador, a professor of history in Boston University and a member of the editorial board of the Boston Globe at the time of his death, were delivered by the former Taoiseach, Dr. Garret FitzGerald, TD, by the journalist Keith Kyle, a former colleague of Mr. Shannon, and by the poet, Seamus Heaney.

The television personality, Gay Byrne, read the eulogy delivered by Senator Edward Kennedy at the funeral Mass for Mr. Shannon in Brookline, Massachusetts, in which he spoke of Mr. Shannon's close ties with the late President Kennedy, and a eulogy by the family was read by Brother Patrick Hederman of Glenstal Abbey. Music was performed by members of the Rathmines and Rathgar Musical Society.

It was announced at the Mass that a William V. Shannon Memorial Fellowship has been established at Boston University, as a memorial to the former ambassador's lifetime interest in preserving and promoting Irish-American understanding through quality journalism in the covering of issues in American politics and government.

The fellowship will give a young Irish journalist the opportunity to study American history, government and journalism at Boston University for one year, and to spend a summer working on Capitol Hill in Washington, DC, in a Congressional office. Applications for the fellowship will be sought by public announcement.

The Memorial Mass was attended by Mr. Shannon's widow, Elizabeth, and by his three sons, Liam, Christopher, and David.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The junior Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. SPECTER, is recognized.

Mr. SPECTER. I thank the Chair.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I wonder if the distinguished Senator would yield for a unanimous-consent request?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield for that purpose?

Mr. SPECTER. I would without losing my right to the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, might I get the attention of the acting majority leader. A number of us are waiting; I am certainly not entitled to go next, but we know we cannot speak longer than 10 minutes. I wonder if we could propound a unanimous-consent request as to some order among the Senators who are present and who seek recognition. Does the distinguished majority leader have any objection to us trying that for a couple of minutes?

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, if I may respond to the distinguished Senator from New Mexico, I am not at liberty at this point, I say to my very good friend, to enter into such an agreement or an arrangement. However, if that request could be withheld for a few moments, perhaps there could be consultation to see what might be worked out.

Mr. DOMENICI. What I would then suggest to the distinguished acting majority leader is that those of us on the floor might submit to him how long we want to speak and perhaps we could get a regimen set up and seek consent. I thank the Chair and I thank my friend from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

BEGINNING OF THE 101ST CONGRESS

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, during the course of the past hour and 15 minutes, as I observed this first opening business day of the Senate in the 101st Congress, I have found it fascinating, really inspirational, to see the proceedings thus far. I join my colleagues who have commended the distinguished new majority leader on his presentation outlining objectives for the Senate and the country. I compliment as well the distinguished Republican leader, who has in turn outlined priorities. Further, I compliment the new President pro tempore, who has presided at the opening session, somewhat different from the past, and I hear it rumored that the President pro tempore may be a continuing Presiding Officer.

Mr. President, I shall speak briefly during morning business on a series of bills which I am introducing today. For the most part, as I say, they represent my continuing efforts from prior Congresses on matters of major national importance—on crime, trade, Social Security, and intelligence issues. The first of these bills is the National Violent Crime Program Authorization Act, which sets forth a series of priorities as I have introduced them in prior Congresses, to dedicate 1 percent of the national budget to domestic defense.

Mr. President, I have had an interest for the past 30 years in crime control. Prior to my service as a Senator and specifically on the Senate Judiciary Committee, I was district attorney of Philadelphia. I worked on the National Commission on Criminal Justice Standards and goals, and I firmly believe that we could have crime control in this country if we took action in two fundamental ways. If we dealt with career criminals in this country, estimated between 200,000 and 400,000 and had sufficient jail cells for lifetime incarceration, I believe that we could reduce violent crime in this country by more than 50 percent, as estimated by the National Commission in 1973, because those career criminals commit in excess of 70 percent of the crimes.

At the same time, Mr. President, I think it is necessary to have a program of realistic rehabilitation for first and some repeat offenders. It is no surprise that when the functional illiterate is released from jail without a trade or skill, that individual goes back to a life of crime. I believe there ought to be realistic efforts made for such rehabilitation, and in that context I think it fair and appropriate when people are career criminals to in effect throw away the key.

The National Violent Crime Program Authorization Act sets forth a comprehensive program to deal with these issues.

Second, Mr. President, I am reintroducing the State Habitual Criminal Incarceration Act which would provide for Federal incarceration for those who are sentenced under State habitual offender acts. More than 40 States currently have such laws, where life sentences are possible for habitual offenders. They vary from three or four offenses depending on the various States. They are not used. They should be used. If there were Federal prison space available for such incarceration, I believe they would be used. And those are criminals who move in interstate commerce, significantly connected with drugs, and it is an appropriate Federal responsibility.

Third, Mr. President, I am reintroducing the State Prison Criminal Rehabilitation Act which provides Federal incentives for States to attempt realistic rehabilitation, very much as we have done in the District of Columbia on a series of bills introduced and measures taken during the time when I chaired the Appropriations Subcommittee for the District of Columbia.

Fourth, Mr. President, I am reintroducing legislation to establish constitutional procedures for the imposition of the sentence of death in Federal criminal cases, as well as create two additional capital offenses.

Fifth, Mr. President, I am reintroducing the Unfair Foreign Competition Act, which would provide for a private right of action to stop subsidies, to stop dumping and to stop violations of our customs and trade laws generally. The trade bill which we passed last year may be of substantial assistance on our trade problems, but I believe there is nothing like the private right of action, such as the private enforcement of the antitrust laws and other private actions. This new private right of action would enforce appropriately existing laws prohibiting dumping, prohibiting subsidies, and prohibiting customs violations.

Sixth, Mr. President, I am reintroducing legislation on Social Security benefits from the "notch" effect realizing the difficulties of enactment of such legislation in light of the budget crunch. This is I think a priority item.

Three other bills will be reintroduced today by me, Mr. President, dealing with intelligence matters. The first would provide for a statutory Central Intelligence Agency inspector general. Last year my legislation in this respect was partially successful on providing statutory improvements which was passed in the Intelligence Authorization Act.

Another bill, Mr. President, would provide for national intelligence reorganization to separate the intelligence—gathering functions from the covert activities, a matter which has long been advocated. I think the time is right for final action by the Congress during this session.

Finally, Mr. President, I am introducing the National Security Reform Act to provide for notice to Congress to avoid the problems which we found in the Iran-Contra affair disclosed in the course of the past 2 years.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my prepared statements and accompanying bills be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the materials will be printed in the RECORD.

VIOLENT CRIME LEGISLATION

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation to address the problems of violent crime in this country. This legislative proposal is an initiative which I have introduced in the past and am reintroducing today because I believe it is necessary to maintain a full court press on the problem of crime in the streets.

This is the successor of three bills I previously introduced—S. 889 in the 98th Congress, S. 486 in the 99th Congress, and S. 411 in the 100th Congress. This bill provides for the authorization of substantial funding to fight violent crime in the United States. This bill and the accompanying tables are based upon hearings in the judiciary Committee, my experience as district attorney of Philadelphia, and the work of the National Commission on Criminal Justice Standards and Goals, of which I was a member.

The essence of this proposal is to spend 1 percent of the Federal budget on domestic defense, which would amount to approximately $1 billion a year over the next 10 years for a total outlay of $10 billion, with a goal of reducing violent crime in this country by some 50 percent, if we directed our attention to the over 200,000 career criminals who are presently at large.

The cost of crime each year on economic ground alone exceeds $100 billion, and when pain, suffering, and psychological duress are considered, the cost of crime in this country exceeds $500 billion each year. On the basis of my experience over the past 30 years, including my work as a prosecuting attorney, in the defense field, and on the Senate Judiciary Committee, I am convinced that if we attack crime systematically, we can reduce violent crime very materially in this country.

Not a day goes by, Mr. President, in virtually every city, town, and hamlet in the United States, without a report of violent crime by someone who is on probation, on parole, or on bail awaiting trial. We know from documented sources and statistics that 70 percent of the violent crimes in this country are committed by 10 percent of the criminals, and they are career criminals.

The American public has lost confidence in law enforcement in this country, and the American public has lost confidence in the ability of government to provide law and order and justice. Our response should be to reconsider our response to crime in the streets and to fashion a system which does, in fact, work.

I am convinced that the American people are prepared to pay for a criminal justice system which works. The State of California, which authored proposition 13 and the tax revolt, passed two referenda authorizing bonds for prison construction. This evidences the fact that even among those who are most concerned about government expenses, there is a willingness to allocate funds to deal with the serious problem of crime control.

In the District of Columbia, substantial initiatives have been undertaken to attempt to make the District a model city, with funds being allocated for realistic rehabilitation where rehabilitation is possible. Although studies show that the most hardened criminals are not subject to rehabilitation, rehabilitation remains viable for juveniles, first offenders, and even some repeat offenders.

To the extent that it is possible to achieve such rehabilitation, resources ought to be allocated accordingly. To the extent that rehabilitation is not realistic—where we deal with career criminals—then, the only alternative is, in effect, to throw away the key, and give career criminals mandatory sentences in order to separate them from the rest of society.

In the face of current budgetary concerns and the efforts at deficit reduction, it will be difficult to fashion new Federal expenditures, however necessary and cost effective they may be.

My own view is that we are engaged in a long-term process educating the American public about ways that government can successfully deal with violent crime. While this legislation doubtless traces a bleak prospect at this precise moment, there will come a day—and I am optimistic that it will be a day in the not too distant future—when we recognize that action of this type must be taken if we are to deal effectively with the problems of juvenile rehabilitation and speedy trial, if we are to get people off bail who are committing new offenses, if we are to educate judges to impose tough sentences on tough criminals, and if we are to have sufficient jail space in our country to incarcerate the career criminals who commit so many violent crimes.

This legislation, Mr. President, would provide for 200,000 additional jail cells. Estimates from experts at a series of Judiciary Committee hearings have disclosed that there are approximately 200,000 to 400,000 career criminals in the United States. Hardened criminals, however, are being released from jails without serving their sentences, because there is insufficient space in the jails; judges are not sentencing convicts who ought to go to prison, because there is insufficient space; parole boards are releasing prisoners prematurely, because there is insufficient space; parolees who violate their parole are not being incarcerated, because there is insufficient space, and probation violators are not being reincarcerated, because there is insufficient space.

Violent crime, Mr. President, I submit, exacts more public pain and has a greater long-term impact on the United States than any other single issue with which the Congress deals. This is evidenced by the fact that public opinion polls regularly indicate that crime is one of the main issues of concern of the American public.

The proposal I make today would respond to that clearly evidenced concern by devoting substantial Federal funding to the attack on violent crime. It would direct 1 percent of the Federal budget for "domestic defense" with a goal of cutting violent crime in this country by 50 percent.

The time has come for a concerted attack on violent crime in the United States. My judgment is that the people of this country are prepared to pay for an attack on violent crime if it is well conceived and well executed.

The proposal which is advanced here today would attack the problem of violent crime on all levels: To emphasize the necessity for tough sentencing by trial judges; to provide correctional facitities where there can be realistic rehabilitation efforts for adult offenders on their first and second offenses so that we do not turn out functional illiterates without skills, who, not surprisingly, return to a life of crime; and, where we have career criminals, in effect, to throw away the key where there are multiple convictions by the same individual.

The program would also be directed at breaking the crime cycle of the juvenile offender, where a juvenile is a delinquent at 6 or 7, a truant at 8, into vandalism at 10, drug trafficking at 13, robbery at 15, and armed robbery and murder at 17.

The objective of this program—and I think its importance—is to cut violent crime by 50 percent, primarily by directing greater attention to career criminals. According to best estimates, there are approximately 200,000 career criminals in this country at the present time. If we could separate them from society, I think we could actually reduce violent crime by 50 percent.

According to the Bureau of Justice statistics, between 1980 and 1984 violent crime was four to nine times greater in the United States than in Europe. Random violence afflicts 1 in 10 American households every year, serious crime, 1 in every 5. The total loss to our society reaches more than $100 billion a year.

Domestic criminals have succeeded where foreign armies failed: They have terrorized not only millions of victims, but all Americans, denying our constitutional rights and our inalienable birthright to the pursuit of happiness.

Most violent felonies are premeditated crimes for profit, committed without passion or provocation against strangers by repeat offenders whose chosen livelihood is to prey on the vulnerable. Although an arrest is made in only one felony in five, most of these career criminals eventually are arrested repeatedly, even if for only a tiny fraction of the scores or hundreds of their crimes.

Once taken into our criminal justice system, however, career criminals often evade justice as effectively as they did arrest in other instances. Dismissals, delays, plea bargains, judge shopping, unrealistic bail, lenient sentencing, early parole, crowded prisons, insufficient job training, enforced idleness, and many other problems combine to nullify law, blunt deterrence, and undermine public safety. Usually, career criminals are back on the street soon, if not immediately. Even career robbers sent to prison serve, on the average, less than 5 years. Many serve only a few months.

In short, the problem is a breakdown in the system. The solution is simply to reorient it: treat serious defendants seriously. Since career criminals, though comprising less than 10 percent of all persons arrested, commit more than 60 percent of all offenses, they warrant our greatest efforts. From investigation to release, violent career criminals should be singled out for highly concentrated attention and rapid, realistic disposition by all concerned. That is not improper selective prosecution, just common sense, if uncommon practice.

Violent crime for profit truly can be cut in half as proposed in 1973 by the National Commission on Criminal Justice Standards and Goals. What is required is a crash effort to focus far greater resources far more narrowly on correcting the specific deficiencies that prevent the system from incapacitating the truly dangerous criminals. Ten years ago, the reduction would have taken only 5 years; now it may take much longer.

The program involves spending 1 percent of the Federal budget on strengthening domestic defense against violent crime by increasing Federal manpower and improving State criminal justice systems, which would still handle over 90 percent of the violent crime caseload. The Federal budget allocation for criminal justice comprises a small fraction of the projected Pentagon budget for the same year.

Cutting serious crime in half would cut the annual cost of crime in half, saving $50 billion. Adding a few billion per year would not only save $50 billion per year, but would also make the other 99 percent of the Federal budget buy billions more value. In short, the program, while it requires modest investment up front, would more than pay for itself within a few years. Moreover, it can be phased in gradually as revenues automatically rise as the economy recovers.

The Congressional Crime Caucus, of which I am cochairman, heard startling testimony on the breakdown of the criminal justice system. Criminals are waging war in our urban centers and appear to be winning the battle against our criminal justice system.

During one hearing, we saw a foreshadowing of the unacceptable consequences of a loss of public confidence in the ability of our criminal justice system to provide law, order, and justice. We must never allow citizens to take the law into their own hands. But in so pronouncing, we must also accept our responsibility to assure that the criminal justice systems works, so that no citizen needs to resort to self-help. This legislation is a major step toward revitalizing the criminal justice system and restoring the public's shaken confidence in it.

The issue is not whether our country can find and afford the funds but whether we now know enough about preventing violent career crime to pinpoint the new expenditures like laser beams rather than, as in the past, disperse them like a light bulb and whether doing so would, in fact, produce so large a reduction. The answer, in a word, is "Yes." The attached chart shows in a page how this goal can be accomplished.

Really, the country cannot afford not to undertake this program.

The full psychological impact of violent crime cannot be quantified, because it is suffered not by actual victims but by potential victims—all of us:

What dollar amount can be attributed to the fright Americans experience when they hear an unexpected noise at 3 a.m. and wonder if a burglar is in the house?

What dollar amount can be attributed to the fear women experience as they walk home at night and a sudden movement toward them suggests a rape or assault or worse?

What losses are sustained when business opportunities are ignored because of the risk of crime?

What dollar amount can be attributed to cancellations and reschedulings to avoid events which conclude after dark?

Compounding the agony, much crime is preventable—if only the murderer had not been paroled, the robber had not been placed on probation, the burglar had not been acquitted because the policeman erroneously filled out a search warrant, or the rapist had not been on bail for 6 months, without being tried.

Governments at all levels—Federal, State, and local—now spend approximately $45.6 billion on crime control, including police, prosecutors, defenders, courts, prisons, and parole programs. My proposal contemplates an increased expenditure of 1 percent of the Federal budget—$11 billion in the first year—with the realistic prospect of reducing violent crime by 50 percent.

Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to join in support of this domestic defense initiative.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a document entitled "National Program to Cut Violent Crime," upon which the proposed program is substantially based, be printed in the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that this bill, the accompanying tables, and summary summarizing annual increases by function also be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A REALISTIC PROGRAM TO REDUCE VIOLENT CRIME BY 50 PERCENT

I. INTRODUCTION

Nearly 16 years ago, after a decade of increasing crime and violence, the National Commission on Criminal Justice Standards and Goals recommended steps for reducing violent crime in America by 50 percent. Unfortunately, many of its key recommendations, such as abolition of plea-bargaining, were never implemented. Now, after another 16 years of escalating street crime, Americans are still waiting for the "crime control" and "safe streets" promised by Congress in a 1968 statute. In fact, the streets have gotten even more dangerous and crime more out of control.

Instead of being decreased 50 percent, as the Commission urged in 1973, violent crime increased. Year in and year out, increases in the crime rate exceeded increases in inflation. And, crime costs citizens even more than inflation and hurts them even worse.

Not only has crime continually increased for decades, but it is vastly worse in America than in any comparable country. The United States suffers much more crime per person than other industrial democracies.

Our crime wave has grown so powerful that now it is destroying whole neighborhoods, bankrupting businesses, shrinking tax revenues, subverting schools and terrorizing senior citizens. Unemployment has numerous causes as many people realize, but few realize that crime is one of them. In fact, crime is cited by businesses as a common cause for closings—not taxes, not government regulation, not foreign competition, but crime.

Nor is violent crime a disaster limited, like a tornado, to some narrow swath. Once the scourge mainly of inner city slums, it now reaches everywhere—cities, suburbs, towns and rural areas; its devastating impact hurts people at all economic levels; it condemns all Americans to living in fear. No epidemic disease or natural disaster has ever ravaged so many Americans. Nor, in the past 16 years, has war. More Americans are killed each year by criminals than by enemy soldiers. As one witness wryly noted in a hearing before a Judiciary Subcommittee, the "score is: Americns killed by Russians—0; Americans killed by criminals—23,000 every year."

The psychological harm from our crime epidemic is immeasurable; the economic harm is not. More economic loss results from crime than from all natural disasters and disease epidemics put together. Each year, crime costs Americans an astonishing 100 billion dollars. The total price of crime, however, is paid not just by the hapless victims, but by all of us—in the form of higher prices, higher insurance rates and higher taxes.

Our national tolerance for the intolerable dismays American's allies and convinces critics that we are a stupid, suicidal, "sick" society. Tolerating crime breeds disrespect for law. Allowing so many to become actual victims and everyone else to become potential victims threatens to sabotage the social compact. When the law abiding see the lawless getting away with it, and sometimes getting rich, too, what happens to their own willingness to serve in the military, support their community, assist their schools, and pay their taxes? Crime threatens not only the safety of individuals, but the security of society. Yet, we still have not resolved to reduce it!

Eliminating crime must await utopia, but reducing violent crime cannot wait any longer. Strangely, we rarely even talk anymore about "reducing" crime. We talk, sometimes, about "crime control". That merely means stopping further increases! That concedes defeat! We talk, often, about the "causes of crime", as a mystery which, once understood, would magically end our national nightmare of random, anonymous criminal violence—the muggings and murders, the rapes and robberies, the break-ins and burglaries.

We are, I suspect, resigned to this much crime because we have come to believe that we have no alternative. This conclusion has been corroborated each year by relentlessly rising crime rates.

Some social commentators argue that we cannot begin reducing crime until we finish eliminating poverty. Others urge minor adjustments in the criminal process as if it were an end in itself. They imply that further refinements in what is already by far the most complex, costly and cumbersome justice system in the world will somehow reduce crime. Still others minimize the role of the judicial process, arguing that decreasing the number of offenses requires increasing the number of policemen. Almost no one anymore believes that hardened criminals can be rehabilitated at will by correctional programs. For humanitarian reasons, prison reform is still championed by concerned persons. But, few believe that reducing prison overcrowding will reduce recidivism.

Our criminal justice system exists primarily to secure safety for citizens—in our streets, schools and homes. It must be fair, but also effective. Judged by its results, our system is falling. Actually, the breakdown is in the state courts, which have been overwhelmed by the volume of cases. State enforcement efforts need federal help.

Combatting violent crime has traditionally been, and I believe should remain, primarily a local responsibility. Primarily, but not exclusively. Indeed, the Constitution of the United States makes clear that crime control is also a federal responsibility. It obligates our national government to secure "the general welfare", and the Executive "to see that the laws are faithfully executed." In taking their oaths of office, federal officials swear to defend the Constitution and the country from "all enemies, foreign and domestic." And violent criminals are our most harmful domestic enemies.

More protection from crime means more resources. I believe the Justice Department needs sufficient resources as much as the Pentagon.

Other ironies abound in this comparison.

For years, we heard of the "missile gap", but not of the "sentencing gap". Legislatures make robbery a crime punishable by 10 to 20 years imprisonment, but many courts regularly give first time robbers probation or short jail sentences.

We worry, properly, about foreign adversaries having "a definite margin of superiority" in strategic arms. What about the "inferiority" of the law abiding citizen to the career criminal? The criminal goes about freely; the citizen changes his lifestyle. Or the "inferiority" of the manpower and equipment—planes, boats, radios—of the drug enforcers, compared to the drug traffickers.

We are concerned, correctly, that imbalance in military forces has opened a "window of vulnerability." With so many burglaries a year in our country. Another "window of vulnerability" we need to be concerned about is every window in our homes.

We believe instinctively in deterrence against the Soviets. We take it on faith that potential adversaries are deterred by the threat of retaliation. Yet, we lack faith that criminals too can be deterred. Instead, some scholars demand massive empirical proof of this obvious fact. Some then declare the evidence unreliable and the results inconclusive. Always, however, they recommend further research. More studies are not needed, more action is.

We have created national commissions to make recommendations on combatting crime and violence. The money, by and large, was not wisely spent. The recommendations, were, by and large, ignored.

The report of the Attorney General's Violent Crime Task Force was presented on August 17, 1981. It contained 64 principal recommendations and scores of subsidiary ones on actions the federal government should take. While indiscriminate spending would produce as little progress as in the past, these recommendations are practical, proven and cost-effective. Their vigorous implementation is needed desperately. The required actions are affordable. In fact, what we cannot afford is inaction.

I spent fifteen years in law enforcement, served two terms as District Attorney of Philadelphia and was a member of the National Commission on Criminal Justice Standards and Goals. From my personal experience, I am convinced that a practical program for this price can, in fact, cut violent crime in this country in half in five years.

The basic outlines of the program can be found in the reports of the National Commission on Criminal Justice Standards and Goals: eliminate plea bargaining, concentrate on career criminals, make punishment swift, sure and sufficient, assure speedy trials and appeals, teach short-term prisoners marketable job skills, incarcerate unrehabilitable repeat violent felons for lengthy periods. On specifics, some of the necessary actions were set forth in the Violent Crime Task Force Report—reform bail laws for dangerous offenders, eliminate early release on parole, and, most importantly, increase federal law enforcement, prosecutive, and correctional personnel and facilities, and provide the states with the financial assistance they need to curtail crime.

The rest of the actions needed are set forth in my Program for Violent Crime.

In truth, we have as much know-how for crime curtailment as for national defense or space exploration. We can find the funds. We lack only the will.

II. THE PROGRAM

It is a program, not just a set of goals and guidelines. In essence, it targets specific "program activities" in the federal budget for increases that will reduce crime.

1. Fugitives

The vast majority of fugitives have fled from local authorities. They are a federal responsibility because they are thought to have fled across state lines. Federal warrants have been issued for their arrest. Federal agents must find them.

The Marshals Service is the principal federal agency responsibile for finding them. It is a most difficult investigative task since by definition fugitives are specifically trying to avoid being found and therefore avoid former homes, work places and friends. They often have many months "head start" on the Marshals who seldom receive productive investigative leads when the receive the warrants. Despite these difficulties, because of other essential duties and insufficient manpower, the Marshals Service is unable to devote sufficient resources to criminal fugitive warrants in the entire country. Nor are all of them Deputy Marshals. Some are clerks and other support personnel.

As a result, only a small fraction of these violent and drug fugitive cases can be actively investigated on an on-going basis. In most cases, the warrant is merely kept on file should the person be arrested again. Paradoxically, if they are later arrested for a serious crime, execution of the warrant will be both too late—since the further offense will already have been committed—and unnecessary—since the new offense itself will probaly lead to incarceration.

The Marshals' fugitive manpower should be at least doubled.

The result would be to prevent tens of thousands of violent felonies. The program would result in far faster apprehensions as well as apprehensions of many fugitives who otherwise would never be found at all. Most of these offenders are recidivists who fled precisely because they feared long jail sentences. Many are true "career criminals"—offenders who commit scores or even hundreds of offenses each year. Some average a felony a day. Apprehending just one such violent fugitive a year earlier, would thus prevent more than 200 serious crimes, save 300 people from being victims, avoid many thousands or tens of thousands of dollars in losses. Each such arrest would measurably reduce violent crime.

Proportional increases in the fugitive personnel of: the FBI; (2) DEA; and (3) all the other agencies would also be required. These increases are important too, for often the agency that originally investigated the fugitive from federal court will best equipped to find him. Thus, when a federal drug defendant jumps bail before trial, the Drug Enforcement Administration, which is the responsible agency, is best prepared to succeed. (The Marshals are responsible after trial, regardless of offense.) The same reasoning applies to the FBI for bank robbers, terrorists and organized crime goons and other agencies for other offenders.

Therefore, $260 million would be added to its fugitive program and ATF, Customs, IRS, Secret Service, et al.

2. The FBI bank robbery program

Another manpower increase which would surely be cost-effective against violent offenders would be in the FBI Personal Crimes Program. The major offense in this program is bank robbery. While every bank robbery is a federal felony and nearly all bank robberies were once investigated entirely by the FBI, today the many of these cases are turned over to local police and prosecutors shortly after an initial FBI response team rushes to the scene of the robbery. Many of these transfers are justified. For example, where a sole, unarmed robber is caught in the bank or trying to escape, the nationwide capabilities and expertise of the FBI are hardly needed. However, insufficient manpower in the FBI requires transfer of many cases in which apprehension by FBI would be more likely and faster.

Moreover, federal prosecutions are far faster and federal sentences far longer than in most urban state courts. Therefore, federal handling vastly reduces the chances for the bank robber to escape arrest or to continue to commit violent felonies before trial or upon early release from prison. Nor do bank robberies constitute an unmanageable burden. They represent a small, stable and clearly defined sub-category of all robberies.

In order to handle all the bank robberies that can be better handled at the federal level, the FBI's allocation to this program should be doubled and redoubled over the next five years. The FBI could then handle 6-7,00 cases.

3. The commercial robbery program

Under the Hobbs Act, any robbery that "interferes with" or "in any degree affects interstate commerce" is a federal felony. Court opinions on the coverage of the Hobbs Act have made plain that the Act applies even to "local" robberies where the effect on interstate commerce is "indirect" and "minimal". Indirect effects have been found whenever the taking depleted the inventory or assets of a business which buys goods in interstate commerce. There is little doubt therefore, that the Hobbs Act applies to virtually every robbery of a store, business office, factory, restaurant, hotel or other place of public accommodation.

Despite this broad statute that potentially could result in many thousands of federal robbery prosecutions (in addition to those for bank robbery), in fact few cases a year are brought for these "commercial robberies" in the entire country. The lack of resources has virtually nullified this Congressional enactment.

The justification has been that commercial robberies are adequately handled in the state system. Yet, it is indisputable that in many cities, the backlogs in state court combined with plea-bargaining result in short "misdemeanor" sentences, if not probation, for these serious felonies. Robbery, after all, is one of the five violent felonies historically regarded as so serious as to warrant application of the "felony murder rule" whereby a killing in the course of such a felony is automatically first degree murder, even where the felon(s) originally had no plan or intent to kill.

Federal resources currently allocated to "commercial robberies" are negligible. To be capable of handling all commercial robberies that are highly complicated or conspiratorial, plainly interstate, or in which guns are discharged, the FBI would have to be expanded by about 1,000 persons over a five year period. Estimates are that 10,000 robberies per year fit one or more of these three criteria. With 1,000 persons, the FBI could handle at least half these cases.

Corresponding increases in prosecutors would be necessary. 500 prosecutors could be added to the existing corps and could handle the additional bank robbery and commercial robbery cases.

4. DEA and the drug enforcement program

Interstate drug trafficking, unlike bank robbery or commercial robbery, is primarily, if not exclusively, a federal enforcement responsibility. Yet, DEA has an insufficient number of investigative agents to cover all the cities that serve as distribution points in the trafficking networks. There are at least twenty cities that are major hubs and dozens more than are minor hubs. In addition, DEA has regulatory, training, overseas and intelligence responsibilities that are critical and divert personnel. In certain hubs, DEA offices typically have fewer than a dozen agents. That is not enough manpower to staff even one wiretap! Clearly, two to four times as many agents are needed.

Since a high percentage of robberies and violent crimes are committed by narcotics addicts and since addicts commit offenses much more frequently when taking drugs than in periods of abstinence, reducing the availability of narcotics will help reduce violent crime. According to testimony before the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Juvenile Justice by Dr. John Ball and other experts, these addict/criminals each commit multiple crimes nearly everyday of the year. They are thus the very worst of the career criminals who as a group comprise less than 10 percent of all persons arrested but are responsible for more than 70 percent of all violent offenses committed.

In addition, DEA should hire, train and integrate with its investigators, financial analysts with CPA credentials. A corps of 500 such accountants should be gradually built up over a five year period. They must be supported by "accounting assistants" on a one-for-one basis, as well as, secretaries and clerks. The total cost would be about $100 million per year. It should soon result in additional forfeitures of many times that amount. Until the vast profits are taken out of drug trafficking, there will always be ample replacements for those imprisoned. Adequate deterrence against drug traffickers requires that the government capture the profits too.

Corresponding increases in FBI and prosecution manpower devoted to drug enforcement would be required.

With these additional resources, we could triple the number of drug arrests and the major seizures and forfeitures per year.

5. The emergency corrections program

The federal manpower increases called for above will, of course, produce more federal prison inmates. Adding investigators will produce predictable increases in arrests, prosecutions and convictions in each of four categories: fugitives, bank robbers, commercial robbers and drug traffickers. Once convicted, nearly all of these felons will be sentenced to prison, most of them for substantial terms. Indeed, the bulk of the present federal prison population consists of bank robbers and drug traffickers. Consequently, substantial increases will be needed in federal prison capacity to accommodate these additional convicts. The state prison systems certainly cannot help, for most of them are severely overcrowded already.

a. Start new Federal prisons.—The solutions are, first, to build new permanent federal facilities, for federal inmates, starting four medium or maximum security institutions (capacity 500) per year for the next five years and four prison camps.

The camps could be opened in about one year of the start and the prisons in about four years of the start of site acquisition. In the meanwhile, increases in the medium to maximum security population could and would be absorbed by existing institutions.

b. Open temporary prison camps for State convicts.—Second, in the meanwhile, extensive use should be made, on a temporary basis, of military barracks on abandoned military basis or unused portions of bases, for state inmates. Existing buildings can be renovated within 6-18 months at modest cost. For 260 million dollars per year, the U.S. Bureau of Prisons, within 1-2 years, could open 8 minimum security prison camps per year that could house some 4 thousand inmates for up to three years. These facilities would be used primarily to relieve state overcrowding pending completion of permanent state prison buildings. They could also handle any federal "overflow" of minimum security inmates.

This temporary program is essential since it takes nearly five years to build a prison—from the initial decision to the entry of inmates. Thus, the states cannot eliminate their overcrowding fast enough to meet court orders (usually federal) to release inmates, even those who have not served their sentences or are unready for release, in order for the remaining immates to "fit" in the prison buildings under constitutionally permitted circumstances. More than half the states presently face such a situation. So that the federal government is assured that necessary state prison space will be made available as soon as possible, it could pre-condition a state's eligility for the federal emergency program for state inmates on the state's beginning construction of prisons for the same number of inmates the federal government is being asked to house temporarily.

Although such temporary "barracks style" facilities would be unsuitable for robbers and for some of the drug traffickers, the Federal Prison System's immigration violators, theft defendants and fraud convicts could safely be placed there. Among state prison populations, about one-third are "property offenders", most of whom probably are suitable for such facilities.

Changing prosecution policies and increasing manpower for offenses like "commercial robbery" will itself relieve state prison overcrowding, as will using temporary federal prison camps to house state "property" inmates. Nevertheless, more than 95 percent of violent criminals are now in the state systems and these changes will not alter the division by about more than 10 percent. Therefore, the long range needs of public safety cannot be met in any other way than by expanding the capacity of the jails in nearly every major city and the prisons in nearly every populous state. This step, will require large and continuing expenditures. Billions of dollars must be spent over a five- to ten-year period to build more state prisons. There is no way to avoid it and still reduce violent and major crime.

Housing State prisoners in Federal penitentiaries

However, an additional way the Federal Government could help relieve overcrowding in state prisons would be to house state inmates sentenced to life imprisonment under the habitual criminal statues in most states. These inmates are unusually costly to house both because of the high level of security required and the length of their incarceration. Often they are confined in the most severely overcrowded facility in the state.

At present, the habitual criminal statutes are not fully used to impose life sentences even for convicts with four, six or eight prior felony convictions. One of the main deterrents is the overcrowding. Another may be the cost. With current knowledge about the realities of recidivism and rehabilitation for this limited group of repeat offenders, the logical policy is incapacitation by imprisonment for life or an equivalent term. While for less hardened offenders, greatly increased efforts at rehabilitation are justified for this group they are not.

Therefore, to encourage state authorities, in appropriate cases in accordance with existing state law, to impose life sentences on career criminals it is proposed that the Federal Government offer to house such inmates on behalf of the states. Each year, two maximum security federal prisons would be started for this purpose. Their capacity when completed would be 4-5,000, enough to accommodate all the anticipated cases.

Since the prison started in the first year of the program would not open until the fourth year, there would be a delay in accepting any of these state inmates. Life sentence violent criminals would require the highest security level and the few federal facilities suitable for these offenders are presently filled to their safe capacity.

c. Federal financial assistance for State prison construction.—Like construction of the Interstate Highway System, this endeavor can appropriately be a joint one. The proper federal role is to meet emergency needs by opening temporary prison camps and to help meet long term needs by securing financing. e.g., by guaranteeing loans. In the mid-term, the federal government should at least contribute toward construction costs in proportion to the inmates it could have, but did not prosecute in federal court. In other words, there should be a presumption that in enacting the various statutes that created concurrent federal jurisdiction for drug trafficking and certain violent crimes, even though plenary state jurisdiction was already in existence, Congress intended substantial federal participation in one form or other. Generally, that means federal prosecution leading to incarceration in federal prisons. Where, however, state prosecution is initiated, the federal role should be to help pay for the prisons to house the persons so convicted.

In any event, the federal government would pay for a proportional part of the cost of all new prisons constructed by various states in the next five years. The federal share of the cost can be calculated with data available to the National Institute of Corrections. Since most states failed to build enough new prisons in recent decades, the financial incentive of "matching federal grants" is apparently needed. It can be excepted to work because the states now recognize the urgency. In order to control and limit such federal grants and fix the total annual appropriation for budgetary purposes, Congress could put a cap of $1 billion per year on the prison fund. Generally, it might be operated much like the highway construction trust fund making grants available to qualifying states on a first come, first served basis. This procedure might further increase the incentive for states to begin a serious building program promptly. Indeed, the Congress could stipulate that the funds could only be used in the year appropriated, if still stronger incentives are needed to get the states started on a crash building program.

6. Research and development and support

The balance of the $2.5 billion appropriated for federal activity would go to federal agencies to double the resources presently available for research and development and for training and support of state and local criminal justice agencies. The objectives would include developing means to end plea bargaining and trial delays. Computer technology would be adapted both to investigative and calendar control tasks. Training would be greatly expanded and identification and lab support speeded up.

7. Financial assistance

Some $7.5 billion per year would be given to state and local authorities for new and augmentation programs for police, courts and corrections specifically for career criminals and violent offenders. The goal would be to assure swifter apprehension, sufficient evidence for conviction of the major charge, greatly expedited trial and sentencing, and corrections programs designed to rehabilitate first or second offenders convicted of violent felonies—with the emphasis on training in marketable job skills and basic English reading and writing, and incapacitate third offenders with lengthy sentences of between 15 years and life. Thus, the program, described below, to improve rehabilitation programs complements the approach of The Armed Career Criminal Act, which requires a mandatory minimum sentence of 15 years to up to life for those convicted of three violent felonies or serious drug offenses found in possession of a firearm. The approach for these hardened violent offenders is "to throw away the key."

a. Special police squads.—The theory is that at every stage from the commission of the offense through service of sentence, violent offenders and career criminals would be singled out for special attention, handling and treatment. The first goal would be to: double the apprehension rate (15 percent to 30 percent for professional burglars); (19 percent to 40 percent for professional robbers, etc.) This would mean creating or expanding special police squads of highly trained investigators who would respond immediately and in force to the scene of every violent felony and conduct full-scale investigations there, including intensive interviews of all witnesses, and who allow follow-up on all leads, vigorously and continuously. It would require greater use of undercover operations like "stings" and "decoys", greater use of forensic laboratory services, more extensive efforts to trace firearms and stolen property and many other steps. The results would be:

1. More career criminals would be caught;
2. they would be arrested sooner;
3. the evience would be stronger; and
4. a higher percentage would be convicted of the main crime and sentenced to appropriate terms.

The ultimate consequences would be a sharp increase in deterrence which should substantially lower the rate of violent felonies for profit. Those not deterred would be incapacitated with strong cases, fast trials and long sentences. This would further lower the violent crime rate.

In many cities, the Police Department would have to create special detective squads for rape, robbery, burglary, narcotics trafficking, etc. Most cities already have a Homicide Squad. Its operations and techniques could provide a very useful general model for the new squads.

The federal role would be to stimulate the creation of these squads, paying full costs for one year. If further federal funding were thought essential, starting in the second year, states could be required to assume costs in 25 percent annual increments. Thus, in its first "transitional" year the squad would be paid for 75 percent with federal funds. Federal support would decrease to 50 percent in the second year and to 25 percent in the third year. In the fourth year, local authorities would pay the full cost. Under the first approach, 100 cities per year could be given $6.2 million for one year. Under the second approach, 100 cities could be helped in the first year and an additional 50 cities in each succeeding year for a total of 300 cities.

In specific terms, formation of such squads in a typical city would mean hiring and training (or retraining), on the average about 100 detectives. In cities which already have such units, the goal would be to double their size. The cost per city would average about $6 million per year, including costs of training, salaries, support personnel, space (where needed) and other such costs.

The total cost to thus assist police departments in cities would be $620 million per year.

b. Career criminal units.—In similar fashion, money should be spent to create or double the size of the Career Criminal Units or specialized prosecution units for rape, robbery, burglary and drug trafficking in the U.S. Attorney and district attorney's offices in the 500 largest counties in the U.S. These units assign a prosecutor to stay with each case from start to finish for thorough preparation and aggressive handling without plea-bargaining. The results are significantly higher conviction rates and far longer sentences for career criminals and violent felons. Such programs, which were started in district attorneys offices in 25 major cities (counties) between 1975–80, proved to have a high impact and, at an average of only $1 million per city, to be highly cost-effective. The program would cost $10 million per year. It would provide $1.5 million for one year only to 100 cities per year for a total of 500 jurisdictions.

c. Case screening and diversion.—The most crucial reform needed in U.S. criminal justice is the elimination of plea-bargaining in violent crime cases. Plea-bargaining results in dangerous repeat offenders being released on probation or after serving brief jail sentences. Although in most states, robbery, a major felony, is punishable by 10–20 years imprisonment in the State penitentiary, many defendants convicted of robbery receive only misdemeanor sentences and serve less than two years, often less than one year, in the county jail.

Such inadequate sentences result from plea-bargaining made under duress by prosecutors because the state courts in most urban areas simply cannot try enough cases. Indeed, in many cities, the vast majority of the cases, including violent felonies, are disposed of not by trial but by guilty plea based on concessions by the government on sentencing. Court congestion and trial delays in combination with ever increasing caseloads that reflect ever increasing crime create the pressure for plea-bargaining. Overcrowded jails and prisons only increase the pressure felt by judges to accept plea and sentencing agreements that do not reflect the seriousness of the crime or the criminal.

To try more major cases requires trying fewer minor cases. Diversion of minor and non-violent cases involving defendants who can be rehabilitated is an essential step. It has been tried and proven highly effective in many populous jurisdictions, including Philadelphia where, as District Attorney, I instituted a diversion program called Accelerated Rehabilitative Disposition. Cases were carefully screened for inclusion in the A.R.D. program which disposed of several hundred cases a week despite using only one judge for one day. Defendants were placed on probation without conviction. The National Commission of Criminal Justice Standards and Goals recognized this program and recommended such diversion programs as appropriate and essential to immediately reducing and and ultimately eliminating plea-bargaining, which the Commission also recommended.

Similar diversion programs have been successfully utilized in federal courts, particularly for drug offenders who were essentially addicts as opposed to traffickers. Although such programs are essential to relieving court congestion, they are not as widely used as they should be. Federal "seed money" is needed to help persuade additional jurisdictions to institute diversion programs. Once authorities see the benefits demonstrated in their own courts, they can be expected to continue and expand the programs and to assume the costs.

Better screening of cases entering both misdemeanor and felony courts is also needed. With their overwhelming caseloads, courts cannot afford to waste scarce resources—judges prosecutors, defenders—on cases that cannot realistically be expected to lead to conviction. All possible judicial time must be carefully husbanded to and applied to disposing of major and violent cases. Intake programs have proven effective in many different kinds of jurisdictions. They should be implemented in all jurisdictions that face crowded court dockets. Again, federal seed money is needed to stimulate the start of such programs in new places.

For $150 million per year, 100 cities each year can institute these programs.

d. Diagnostic and classification improvements for prisoners.—Just as better case screening will improve the results of court efforts, better screening of convicts will improve the odds of reducing recidivism. It is true that many convicted persons are adversely influenced by their fellow inmates and that, for them, prisons become schools for crime. But this problem can be diminished although not eliminated by better classification procedures so younger and less serious offenders are not intermingled with career criminals and other hardened or older offenders. In addition, better diagnosis of the specific nature of any drug or alcohol addiction and deficiencies in basic literacy and job skills can greatly improve the chances of rehabilitation if coupled with resources to provide more training, education, counseling, detoxification and prison industry. Specific programs should be formulated individually, for each inmate to encourage him to attain basic English literacy, which most violent crime convicts lack, and to acquire marketable job skills in order to have a realistic chance of obtaining and keeping employment.

Resources for rehabilitation will always be less than the need. Therefore, none can be wasted on inmates who are unlikely to profit from them or misdirected to inmates who need some other kind of training than what is provided to them. The reality is that virtually all first offenders and most second offenders convicted of violent crimes will be released within a few years. Improving public safety requires reducing the recidivism of these groups as much as it requires lengthy incarceration of career criminals with three or more felony convictions.

The U.S. Bureau of Prisons and several state prison systems have sufficiently perfected techniques for diagnostic and classification services and for individualized correctional programming to warrant the replication of these programs in all state prison systems and county jails that do not already have them. The emphasis, of course, should be on the state prisons and on violent offenders.

For $350 million per year, all state systems could begin or expand such programs. By the end of a five year period, enough evidence of lower recidivism rates should have been accumulated to convince the recipients to continue these programs with state and local funding. Meanwhile, the public, not to mention the inmates, would derive important benefits in reduced crime rates.

The importance of these steps cannot be overestimated. Studies show that a small percentage of offenders commit the majority of all violent offenses. Accordingly, a small reduction in the recidivism rate for these offenders when released from prison following a first or second conviction should produce a large reduction in the crime rates.

e. Training in job skills and basic literacy.—The evidence is overwhelming that most offenders convicted of violent crimes are functionally illiterate and practically unemployable. Mandatory programs should be instituted in all state prisons to teach 6th grade literacy and basic industrial and commercial skills to all inmates, except the very few who lack the ability or will to achieve even these modest goals.

Many state systems and the federal prison system have developed various techniques including prison industries, for these purposes. Unfortunately, many state institutions do not have adequate programs and some have none at all.

For $350 million a year, all state institutions could, over a five year period, begin or expand such training. On the average, each state would receive $7 million per year.

The realities of local and state politics, all the more so in these times of economic distress, simply preclude getting such funding from most state legislatures. Again, the hope is that once started, the value to public safety of such programs will ultimately be sufficiently recognized to warrant their continuation with state funds.

f. Juvenile delinquent intervention.—Over one-third of all violent crime is committed by young offenders. Nearly all these offenders have a long history of escalating criminality, typically starting at about age 9 or 10 with truancy and shoplifting, then burglary of vacant premises at 12, burglary of residences at 14, followed by robbery at 16 and armed robbery at 18. To control and reduce violent crime in this country, we must prevent adults sent to prison from simply being replaced by such "graduating" juveniles. Studies by Professor Marvin Wolfgang and others reveal that only 6 percent of the juveniles who commit any offense commit about 70 percent of all the crime committed by their age group. Moreover, procedures have been developed by the Rand Corporation for identifying this group, so the efforts to cut off this escalating crime cycle can be concentrated on the small percentage of juvenile offenders who are on this path toward major violence.

It is proposed to grant to state and local authorities $880 million per year to vastly increase counseling and other efforts to intervene vigorously and early enough to divert the juvenile from a life of felonious violence. Such intervention should focus on juveniles in the 10-13 age group to have optimal chances of success. The funds would enable 100 cities to each spend $8.8 million each year to create or expand such intervention capabilities to prevent development of future career robbers. If local authorities are required to assume the costs in 25 percent annual increments, starting in the second year, an additional 200 jurisdictions could participate over a five-year period.

Two closely related programs are also recommended: (1) crime prevention in schools—$620 million per year; and (2) runaways and missing children—$350 million per year.

g. Crime prevention in schools.—The school program would focus on elementary school and junior high school students and apply counselling and other services to potential juvenile delinquents upon the earliest signs of trouble. According to studies and testimony before the Subcommittee on Juvenile Justice, teachers often identify future criminals even earlier than Juvenile Court authorities. For those youth who do get taken to court, the schools must become part of any correctional program for the individual that may be ordered by the court and implemented primarily by probation personnel.

Resources for such efforts are vastly inadequate. Politically, they are difficult to secure from state and local legislative bodies. Any additional resources that might become available to schools would ordinarily go to the instructional program. The purpose of federal funding would be to replicate proven successes from comparable school systems in all systems with the need. The $620 million per year would pay for the institution of such programs in several hundred school systems.

The programs would stress not so much services to individual youth, but improving the discipline in the school by preventing classroom and hallway violence, drug trafficking and vandalism. Thus, in addition to special counselling, the programs could include additional security personnel and devices.

h. Runaways and missing children.—The program for runaways would provide funds to maintain, expand or build suitable facilities for homeless youth so they are not intermingled with juvenile offenders or placed in prison like facilities. One of the great successes of the federal Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention was the deinstitutionalization of runaways and other youth who had committed no crime.

On the average, each state would receive $7 million per year for a total national investment of $350 million.

The money would also help pay for computerized and other information services so important to the families of missing children. Often these children have been the subject of "parental kidnapping". The spouse with whom they had been living have no knowledge of the child's whereabouts or welfare.

i. Adult crime prevention.—Programs at $620 million per year each are also proposed for Neighborhood and Commercial Crime Prevention. Numerous well-proven models exist and would be replicated in hundreds of new cities and thousands of new neighborhoods. An example of the former is the neighborhood watch programs in which volunteer residents patrol their area with radio and other equipment provided by the government. They report suspicious persons and events to police who exclusively handle all investigative or enforcement actions. An example of the latter is the installation in stores of cameras and other security devices to help deter crime as well as assist in the identification and apprehension of criminals. For instance, money marked with a strong dye might be furnished to store tellers and clerks to be given to any robbers.

The funding level would allow 500 cities per year to participate in these two programs. Funding would be for a single year. Thus, over five years, 2,500 cities and towns would benefit.

j. Drug treatment.—One of the best possible crime prevention measures would be improved efforts to detoxify drug addicts and habitual abusers of controlled substances. Studies show that a high percentage of crime, including violent crime, is committed by addicts. One study showed that of 243 randomly selected addicts, 238 committed crimes. Moreover, they committed an astonishing 500,000 crimes over an 11 year period. They averaged 2,000 major and minor offenses for every year on the street and committed one or more crimes on nearly 350 days of the year. Another study showed that a group of robbers serving state prison sentences were mostly addicts and committed six drug sales for every robbery.

The proposal is to add $620 million per year to the treatment efforts of state and local authorities, concentrating on addicts who are violent offenders. The money would be for starting or expanding treatment programs and would benefit several hundred jurisdictions over a five year period. On the average, it could help 500 cities and towns per year. Better results might be obtained by giving larger amounts to 1 or 200 cities and continuing the grants for several years.

k. Victim witness assistance.—Studies and experience show that monetary and other assistance is often needed by victims and witnesses whose willing cooperation is crucial to securing convictions of violent offenders and career criminals. Medical bills and wages lost on days in court are the greatest financial problems. Information to keep witnesses abreast of developments as their cases proceed through the court systems is also important to assuring the availability and attitude of cooperation of witnesses.

For the $620 million per year that is proposed, programs copying well-established models could be started in up to 500 communities a year.

1. Court calendar control

Nothing is more important in improving criminal justice than assuring speedy trial. All states should, as a prerequisite of federal justice assistance, require that all criminal trials be concluded in six months or less. The standard for violent offenses should be three months with the average being six weeks.

Reducing delays also requires implementing reforms in the administration of criminal case dockets. Computers can play an important role in large jurisdictions. In many situations, adoption of the individual Judge Calendars used so successfully in federal courts would greatly speed trial dispositions. Reforms of discovery rules can also play an important role.

To end plea bargaining, more cases must be disposed of by trial and trials must be conducted more efficiently. Causes of delay are numerous and vary greatly from jurisdiction to jurisdiction. In some, delays in obtaining trial transcripts can delay disposition of post-trial motions and imposition of sentence for many, many months. In others, different problems plague the system.

The National Center for State Courts and other similar institutions have developed and refined analytical techniques to pinpoint the problems and solutions in a particular jurisdiction.

The proposed $260 million per year would support analysis in hundreds of jurisdictions by these institutions that can dispatch teams to work closely with responsible local officials. It would also support application of computer technology to management of the criminal caseload in these jurisdictions. Improvement in case management is essential to improving public safety.

ADDITIONAL CONSIDERATIONS

Dispersal of State assistance funds

No new federal bureaucracy would be created. Little discretion is entrusted to federal Executive Branch officials and employees because Congress will have decided, as it does for national defense, how much will be spent for what, in each functional area.

There would be no layers of government through which funds would filter to the user. Instead, the money would go directly from the Justice Department to the state or local agency that will spend it. Nor would there be complicated application forms or extended processing time. If a jurisdiction will use money from a specific budget line item for the purpose stipulated, it will get the money.

Where more jurisdictions apply than the funds can accommodate, a "first come, first served" approach would be utilized. As to the size of a grant to a particular agency, for example, a metropolitan court administrator's office, a few simple formulas based on population and/or violent crime rate could be readily devised.

To avoid creating an excessive dependency on federal financing, matching state funds could be required. To give the program maximum immediate impact, however, the first year's grant would not require a match.

Pacing the program

The increase could not all be absorbed in the first year of this program, but most of it could. The increases for federal programs mostly concern on-going operations of agencies like FBI which would hire, train and integrate new personnel. Doing this efficiently and without major disruption would require starting slowly and then increasing the rate. The annual expenditures will be relatively low in the first year and grow sharply in succeeding years, as the money is nearly all used for salaries of new personnel. Thus, the total for federal personnel would not be reached until the fourth or fifth year.

By contrast, the funds for most state programs such as prison construction can and should be allocated in full right from the start. They can be committed under contract very quickly. Even money earmarked for local police departments could be spent quickly since creating a new squad of 50 or 100 detectives is best accomplished in a short time frame. Moreover, adding 100 new employees in departments with thousands represents a small enough percentage increase that no significant disruption is expected.

Most of the funds for state programs should be appropriated as "no year money", meaning that it may be obligated and expended in years subsequent to the year appropriated. Money for all federal programs should be appropriated in due course. Even the funds for federal prison construction can be normal appropriations since for these facilities, unlike state facilities. Congress has both the obligation and the capability to manage the money on an annual basis.

If, as might be expected in the first year, the states do not obligate all funds available for construction, these funds would accumulate. Therefore, in the third year, for example, the fund might contain twice the annual appropriation. However, since the large construction bills would come due in that period, the larger amounts would be needed then. Thus, the full amount for state assistance should be appropriated in the first year of the program.

Adjusting the funding

If the construction fund ever grew larger, even than anticipated needs, in later years of the program the annual appropriation could be decreased. The program is flexible.

Reducing and ending the program

The increased appropriations for federal enforcement operations would probably be continued in large part even beyond the period of the program, but the money for new state construction and new units and operations is intended as a one-time boost to state justice systems in a period of emergency. It could be largely discontinued after about five years, if the 50% decrease is achieved before the end of 10 years. In any event, it would end after 10 years.

It could be predicted that at least half of the funds for federal investigative operations would become part of the permanent budget base. Cut-backs would be appropriate for example in the fugitive programs once the backlogs of unserved warrants are eliminated.

The $630 million for construction of new federal prisons could be also largely discontinued after a few years. Even the $620 million for training and research could be greatly reduced if not totally eliminated.

Therefore, the $10 billion program would not become a permanent part of the federal budget. Less than $1.2 billion would remain.

S. 178

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "National Violent Crime Program Authorization Act, Fiscal Year 1990".

SEC. 2. On the basis of evidence, information, and documents and testimony collected by the committees and subcommittees of the Congress and the reports and recommendations of various national commissions, including the National Commission on Criminal Justice Standards and Goals (1973) and the Attorney General's Violent Crime Task Force (1981), the Congress hereby makes and adopts the following findings:

(1) Violent crime and drug trafficking have become a severe national problem affecting the personal safety and general welfare of citizens of the United States and an intolerable burden upon Interstate Commerce.

(2) The economic costs of crime are estimated to exceed $100,000,000,000 per year and the total cost of crime including pain, suffering, and psychological duress are estimated to exceed $500,000,000,000 per year.

(3) The Federal Government presently allocates approximately $6,500,000,000 of its annual budget to crime control and criminal justice. This allocation represents just over one-half of 1 per centum of the Federal budget.

(4) It is estimated that spending by State and local law enforcement and criminal justice agencies of the various States is approximately $24,000,000,000 a year. Due to limited revenues, rising costs, and other factors, the States and localities are severely limited in their capability to provide greater resources for law enforcement and criminal justice.

(5) Every year, serious crime afflicts one in every five American households. One in every ten households is affected by criminal violence.

(6) The violent crime rate in America has reached unprecedented and intolerable levels. The violent crime rate has risen 400 per centum since 1945; the United States suffers from a crime rate which is many times that of any other industrial democracy.

(7) The resources available at all levels of government are seriously inadequate to secure public safety. Consequently, only a small fraction of crimes result in an arrest, a small fraction of arrests result in trial and conviction, in contrast to plea bargain, and only a small fraction of convictions for violent offenses result in sentences to prison.

(8) Career criminal constitute less than 10 per centum of all persons arrested but commit more than 60 per centum of the offenses. Despite the priority accorded to them, career criminals are often not handled effectively due to inadequate resources.

(9) Likewise, crime prevention programs have not been given sufficient resources, resulting in much serious crime that could have been prevented. Particular attention is needed for juvenile offenders to break the escalating crime cycle, for drug addicted offenders and for providing literacy and training in marketable job skills to prisoners nearing the end of their sentences.

(10) Drug trafficking, which is estimated to have grown to a $80,000,000,000 a year business that contributes to and causes a high proportion of the violent activity, has not been curtailed despite recent increases in the level of effort, particularly by Federal enforcement agencies.

(11) The prison systems in more than forty States are so overcrowded as to be subject to court orders to release inmates prematurely and to deter judges from imposing sentences in individual cases that fit the crime and the criminal. The prison population has risen sharply in recent years. However, in many States few if any prisons have been built in recent decades.

(12) Major efforts are needed to improve the treatment of victims and witnesses in criminal cases and to compensate them for physical and economic injury and loss.

(13) In order to insure speedy justice, numerous court reforms are needed, including improved case screening and diversion programs, use of computers and other techniques to control judicial calendars.

(14) To improve the arrest rate, conviction rate, and sentences for career criminals, special units are needed in police departments, prosecutors' offices, and other agencies.

In light of the foregoing, a comprehensive national program must be commenced. Such a program should devote 1 per centum of the Federal Budget or approximately $10,000,000,000 for a period of up to ten years with the goal of cutting violent crime for profit in half.

SEC. 3. In order to begin such a program in fiscal year 1990 and to begin it in a gradual, orderly manner, there is authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1990 to carry out the National Violent Crime Program:

(a) For the detection, investigation, apprehension, prosecution, and incarceration of individuals involved in violent crime activity and drug trafficking, not otherwise provided for, $1,200,000,000, of which $300,000,000 for construction of new facilities and construction, remodeling, and equipping buildings and facilities at existing detention and correctional institutions shall remain available until expended, and notwithstanding any other provision of law, there is authorized payment in advance for expenses arising out of contractual and reimbursable agreements with State and local enforcement agencies engaged in cooperative violent crime and drug trafficking enforcement activities, as follows:

	(Millions)
Fugitive programs	125
New Federal prosecutions for violent crimes, such as bank and commercial robbery	175
Drug enforcement	300
Training, lab, identification, and other support services and technical assistance to States by Federal agencies	150

Construction of correctional facilities for Federal inmates and operating costs	125
Temporary detention facilities for State inmate "overflow" and permanent prisons for confinement of all State habitual offenders sentenced to life	175

(b) For Justice assistance and to carry out the functions of the Justice Office of Assistance, $3,650,000,000, all of which shall remain available until expended: Provided, That such funds may only be used to carry out the National Violent Crime Program, pursuant to regulations issued by the Head of Justice Office Assistance and policies and priorities established by the Attorney General in consultation with the Congress and appropriate congressional committees, as follows:

CAREER CRIMINAL INCARCERATION

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I am today introducing the Career Criminal Incarceration Act of 1989. This bill is based upon three bills I previously introduced—S. 58 in the 98th Congress, S. 1189 in the 99th Congress, and S. 414 in the 100th Congress.

In 1983, I authored the Armed Career Criminal Act, which made the commission of a felony involving use of a firearm a Federal offense if the defendant has three prior convictions for robbery or burglary. This bill was signed into law by President Reagan as part of the Comprehensive Crime Control Act on October 12, 1984. In the 99th Congress, I offered an amendment to the omnibus drug bill to broaden the scope of the predicate offenses to include serious drug offenses and violent crimes.

The bill I introduce today is an equally important part of our effort to deal with the plague of career criminals—those 10 percent of criminals who are responsible for 70 percent of all serious crime.

The bill grants the Attorney General authority to incarcerate in Federal facilities persons convicted and sentenced to life imprisonment in State courts under State habitual offender statutes.

Permitting these persons to be transferred to Federal prisons will encourage more prosecutions under State career criminal statutes. These statutes normally allow judges to sentence habitual offenders for significant periods in order to keep them from engaging in further criminal activity. Often, local district attorneys have task forces specially created to target career criminals. Unfortunately, however, long-term incarceration of these criminals is nearly impossible due to already crowded conditions in State prisons. Indeed, State prisoners are sometimes set free early to make room for the continuing stream of newly convicted persons.

By holding persons sentenced to life imprisonment under State career criminal statutes, the Federal Government would reduce the burden of such sentences on States, and encourage them to actively seek long sentences for career criminals under such statutes.

Recent statistics show that State prison populations continue to increase at an alarming rate. In 1984, 24,281 prisoners were added to the prison rolls in the States and the District of Columbia. During the same period, 2,337 prisoners entered the Federal prison system. The number of inmates sentenced to State prisons for more than 1 year grew by 6.2 percent, whereas the comparable population in Federal prisons grew by only 4.8 percent. Even these statistics do not tell the full story. At the end of 1984, State prison systems were operating at approximately 110 percent of capacity. There was a backlog in local jails of more than 11,000 prisoners; overcrowding accounted for the early release of more than 17,000 inmates in 14 States. Overcrowding also resulted in the operation of the entire prison systems of six States and the District of Columbia under a court order or consent decree. At least one major prison was being operated under court order or consent decree in 25 other States. The prison populations in States without court intervention increased at 9.2 percent compared to a 2.9-percent increase in State systems entirely under court order.

The States need help from the Federal Government to reduce overcrowded prison conditions. Society needs States to actively utilize existing career criminal statutes. This bill serves both of these goals, by allowing special targeting efforts to be directed at career criminals by States without adding to their crowded conditions.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 180

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) Congress finds that—

(1) career criminals commit a larger percentage of the violent and major felonies afflicting society, causing immeasurable physical injury to innocent persons and damage, destruction, or loss to their property estimated at billions of dollars annually, thereby terrorizing law-abiding citizens, disrupting the community, and undermining respect to law:

(2) the continuing criminal activity of career criminals adversely affects interstate commerce;

(3) despite prior convictions for serious offenses, many repeat offenders are placed on probation or sentenced to unduly short terms of imprisonment by State judges, to the detriment of public safety;

(4) many repeat offenders cannot reasonably be rehabilitated and, unless incarcerated for life, will commit further felonies;

(5) many States have "habitual criminal" statutes providing for life sentences for repeat offenders, upon subsequent felony convictions;

(6) many State prison systems are severely overcrowded, understaffed, and unable to confine convicts sentenced to life imprisonment under such statutes in a safe, secure, and humane manner;

(7) State judges may be deterred by the lack of sufficient prison space, staff, and funding from imposing life sentences for offenders as provided by State law, and the legislatures in those States without habitual criminal statutes may be dissuaded by such considerations from enacting such statutes;

(8) the interests of justice and public safety would be served if State authorities felt free to impose life sentences for repeat major offenders unrestrained by such considerations;

(9) the Federal Bureau of Prisons sometimes has empty cells available and can make additional space available by consolidating inmates, consistent with suitable standards, and ultimately can open additional institutions and cells, without great cost or delay, in certain Federal facilities, including abandoned military facilities and Public Health Service Hospitals; and

(10) the Federal Bureau of Prisons has an outstanding record in safety, effectively and humanely confining inmates sentenced to life imprisonment.

(b) The Congress declares that the purpose of this Act is to remove undue restraints on States imposing life sentences on repeat major offenders by authorizing the Federal Government to assume custody of prisoners sentenced under State habitual criminal statutes to imprisonment for life, without cost to the State.

SEC. 2. (a) Upon request by a State pursuant to section 3, the Federal Bureau of Prisons of the Department of Justice shall promptly arrange and accept custody of convicts who are sentenced to life imprisonment under the habitual criminal statutes of a State, to the extent that space is or can be made readily available in the Federal prison system. The Federal Bureau of Prisons shall confine such convicts until certification to the Attorney General by appropriate authorities of the State that the sentence of a transferred prisoner has been terminated by parole, pardon, or otherwise as provided by State law, or, absent such certification, for the natural life of the prisoner.

(b) This Act shall apply only to the incarceration of persons sentenced to imprisonment for life under the State habitual criminal statutes after the date of enactment.

SEC. 3. (a) All applications for Federal incarceration under this Act shall be subject to approval by the Attorney General of the United States and shall include a certification by the State that the prisoner to be transferred has been sentenced to life imprisonment under a State habitual offender statute.

(b) The Attorney General shall have the authority to review the nature and circumstances of the offenses committed by any prisoner who is proposed for transfer and the existing capacities of the State prison system from which transfer is sought. The Attorney General may reject any application for Federal incarceration based upon each consideration and upon the availability of space in the Federal prison system. The decisions of the Attorney General under this subsection shall not be subject to review by Federal or State courts.

INCENTIVE FOR CRIMINAL REHABILITATION IN STATE PRISONS

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I am reintroducing today legislation which would provide incentives to provide rehabilitation for those who are in the criminal justice system who can be rehabilitated. If you take a first offender and some second offenders, it is possible to have some realistic rehabilitation. It is no surprise when an inmate without a trade or skill, a functional illiterate, is released from jail and goes back to a life of crime. In the District of Columbia there have been initiatives in the course of the past 6 years, which I worked on in my capacity as former chairman of the District of Columbia Subcommittee, which are embryonic, just in their initial phases, but are already proving successful. I believe they can serve as a model on a national basis.

Mr. President, I am today introducing a bill to encourage criminal rehabilitation in State prisons by providing prisoners with training in a marketable job skill and basic literacy.

We must impose tough sentences on tough criminals, particularly career criminals. At the same time, however, we must make a realistic effort at rehabilitation where possible.

As district attorney of Philadelphia, I visited all of the prisons of Pennsylvania, and I have had occasion for more recent visits to Pennsylvania prisons as a Senator. These experiences have shown me that many convicts are routinely released as functional illiterates without a skill or trade. It is not surprising that many of these convicts return to the streets and commit more crimes.

This bill requires that States make a good-faith effort to ensure that prisoners released after a term of imprisonment of 2 years or more have had training in reading, writing, and a basic job skill. In this way, such prisoners will be able to earn their way lawfully on the outside without resorting to a life of crime.

The former Chief Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court repeatedly had emphasized the need for making educational and vocational training available to prisoners. In his yearend report for 1984, Chief Justice Burger stated:

> Prisoners must be given the opportunity to learn marketable skills, both to repay the government some of the costs of confinement and to train them for life after release.

Mr. President, this bill is derived from three previous bills I introduced—S. 59 in the 98th Congress S. 1190 in the 99th Congress, and S. 413 in the 100th Congress.

I believe that the present bill would greatly serve the national interest, by providing our inmates a way out of recidivism. Without the education and training in a marketable vocation that this bill would encourage, these prison inmates stand little chance of leaving crime behind and leading productive, law-abiding lives.

I ask unanimous consent that this bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 181

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) the prison authority of a State shall have an obligation to provide prisoners with training in a marketable job skill and basic literacy, and the parole authority shall not release a prisoner sentenced under the law of the State to a term of two years or more prior to the expiration of his sentence unless the State has made reasonable efforts to meet such obligation. The State shall be deemed to have met its obligations under this section if the prisoner already has such training, the prisoner refuses to accept such training, or the Attorney General concurs in the State's judgment that provision of such training would be unreasonably costly in a particular instance: Provided, however, That the Attorney General shall not exempt a State generally from its obligations under this section on the basis that compliance would be unreasonably costly.

(b) On or before one hundred and eighty days before the effective date of this Act, the Attorney General of the United States shall, after consultation with the State Prison Vocational Skills Advisory Council, promulgate such regulations as are necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act including a determination of what constitutes a "marketable job skill and basic literacy".

SEC. 2. (a) Notwithstanding any other provision of Federal law, any State desiring to receive any grant, contract, award, or other assistance paid for from Federal funds for use in its prison programs, shall certify to the Attorney General that it is in compliance with the provisions of this Act.

(b) Except as provided in subsection (c), any State which fails to comply with this Act shall be ineligible to receive any Federal funds for its prison programs until such time as the State can certify to the Attorney General that it is in compliance with the provisions of this Act.

(c)(1) If the Attorney General determines that a State has made a good faith effort to comply with the provisions of this Act, the Attorney General may grant such State probationary status for one year during which time the State shall be eligible for any Federal funds for prison programs, notwithstanding subsection (a).

(2) No State shall be eligible for probationary status under paragraph (1) for more than two years.

SEC. 3. (a) There is established the State Prison Vocational Skills Advisory Council (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "Council") which shall advise the Attorney General of the United States regarding regulations necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act. The Council shall be composed of—

(1) the Associate Attorney General, who shall serve as its chairman;

(2) the Director of the Federal Bureau of Prisons;

(3) the Under Secretary of Labor; and

(4) six representatives from State and local prison systems, each from a different State, to be selected by the Attorney General.

(b) It shall be the duty of the Council to advise the Attorney General in formulating regulations as provided in section 1(b).

SEC. 4. Nothing in this Act shall be—

(1) construed to reflect the intent of Congress to invalidate or modify any State law except insofar as it may be directly inconsistent with this Act, or

(2) construed as creating any right in any State prisoner.

SEC. 5. this Act shall become effective one year after the date of the enactment of this Act.

DEATH PENALTY LEGISLATION

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, today I introduce legislation which enhances the Federal Government's fight against crime. This bill is based on S. 2863 which I introduced on October 5, 1988, toward the end of the 100th Congress to give my colleagues an opportunity to study this matter in advance of the 101st Congress. My bill will establish constitutional procedures for the imposition of the sentence of death in Federal criminal cases, as well as create two additional capital offenses.

It is my sense that this legislation is long overdue. The various Federal offenses which include a capital penalty have not met constitutional muster since the Supreme Court squarely addressed this issue in Furman versus Georgia, in 1972. This body had not responded to the High Court's ruling and I believe now is the time to do so. There are various Federal statutes which include capital crimes. These offenses include treason, assassination of the President, murder and air piracy and cover other offenses where existing Federal law calls for the death penalty, but procedures have not been updated to accommodate decision by the Supreme Court of the United States since 1972.

This legislation will create two additional capital crimes. The first provides for the death penalty for a prisoner serving a life sentence in a Federal confinement institution who commits murder. This is a continuing problem in our Nation's prison system, including our Federal system. This provision will apply to those prisoners already beyond redemption or rehabilitation—those already sentenced to life imprisonment for their prior heinous crimes.

Clearly, there is no deterrent for someone already serving a life sentence if the most that can happen with another murder is an additional life sentence. This provision will provide such a deterrent by allowing a jury or court to impose the sentence of death after considering numerous relevant factors, including whether the murder occurred during an escape attempt, a kidnapping, a prison riot, the taking of hostages, sexual assault as a result of drug dealing, or by use of a firearm.

This legislation also would amend a statutory provision that I authored in 1986, 18 U.S.C. 2331, and make a violation of that provision a capital crime. This section, which authorizes extraterritorial jurisdiction for the United States over terrorist acts abroad against American citizens, presently provides a maximum penalty of life imprisonment. Sadly, and with increasing frequency, terrorists are attacking American citizens throughout the world and I believe it is wholly appropriate that such despicable actions be considered a capital offense.

CONSTITUTIONALITY

Mr. President, a complete revision of the Federal Criminal Code to provide for the death penalty in appropriate circumstances must meet the constitutional guidelines set forth by the Supreme Court. In Furman against Georgia, the Court did not conclude that capital punishment is unconstitutional, but only the procedures of the Georgia statute were constitutionally invalid because it provided unguided discretion to the factfinder. Other States' statutes were similar to Georgia's and the ultimate effect of the Court's decision was in invalidation of most capital punishment statutes throughout the country. However, 37 States and Congress have reenacted capital punishment statutes in accordance with the procedures articulated by the Court. In fact, in 1976, Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153, the Court again reviewed the constitutionality of capital punishment and upheld Georgia's revised death penalty law.

Since that time, procedures promulgated by the States have continually met constitutional muster. Some have argued, however, including members of the Supreme Court, that capital punishment itself is unconstitutional. My reading of the constitutional results in a different conclusion. There are numerous instances in the Constitution of the United States which specifically recognizes and permits capital punishment. For example, the fifth amendment specifies that "no person shall be held to answer for a capital * * * crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury * * *"; the fifth amendment also provides "nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life and limb * * *"; and that no person shall "be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law * * *"

Moreover, in 1953, Chief Justice Warren wrote:

> At the outset let us put to one side the death penalty as an index of the constitutional limit on punishment. Whatever the arguments may be against capital punishment both on moral grounds and in terms of accomplishing the purpose of punishment, and they are forceful, the death penalty has been employed throughout our history and, in a day when it is still widely accepted, it cannot be said to violate the constitutional concept of cruelty." Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86, 99 (Dicta) (1958).

In addition to the legal underpinnings of the Court's conclusion that capital punishment is constitutional, there also was some consideration of the general sentiment throughout the country in support of the death penalty:

> Despite the continuing debate, dating back to the 19th Century over the morality and utility of capital punishment, it is now evident that a large portion of American society continues to regard it as an appropriate and necessary criminal sanction.
> The most marked indication of society's endorsement of the death penalty for murder is the legislative response to Furman. The legislators of at least 35 states have enacted new statutes to provide for the death penalty for at least some crimes that result in the death of another person. The United States Congress in 1974, enacted a statute providing the death penalty for aircraft piracy that results in death. * * * But all of the post-Furman statutes make clear that capital punishment itself has not been rejected by the elected representatives of the people." Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. at 179–81.

Significantly, opinion polls—while not of legal significance, nonetheless support the Court's conclusion that there is "a market indication of society's endorsement of the death penalty." A 1986 poll concluded that 70 percent favored the penalty with 22 percent in opposition and 8 percent with no opinion.

Consequently, with requisite procedural protections, capital punishment is an appropriate and supportable penalty. This legislation will offer the full panoply of procedural protections required by the Supreme Court for the accused and ensure that civil and constitutional rights are maintained. The procedural protections in this bill are similar to those promulgated by the States, as well as provided in S. 2455, "Death Penalty in Cases of Drug Related Killings," offered by my colleague, Senator D'AMATO and passed by the Senate on June 10, 1988, and enacted into law as a provision in the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988.

The procedural process includes bifurcated proceedings; a listing of aggravating factors and a nonexclusive listing of the mitigating factors; and a provision of the automatic appeal of the judgment.

The Government would be required to give notice to the defendant before trial of the intention to seek a sentence of death. If found guilty of the offense, a sentencing hearing would be held before the same jury, or another legally constituted factfinder. The factfinder would make a series of determinations before a sentence of death could be imposed. The threshold requirements for a capital sentence are: First, a conclusion that a general aggravating factor exists; and second, that a specific aggravating factor to the particular offense also exists. If these requirements are not met, the sentence of death cannot be imposed.

Additionally, a finding of any aggravating factor must be by unanimous agreement. The findings of any mitigating factors as specified in the bill or determined independently, would weigh against aggravating factors to determine whether the sentence of death should be imposed.

Unanimous consent would not be required to establish a mitigating factor, such a finding could be made by one or more members of the jury. Any member of the jury who finds a mitigating factor may consider such a factor when deliberating the application of the death penalty.

The imposition of the death penalty would only occur upon the unanimous vote by the jury. Importantly, a sentence of death would not be carried out upon a person who is under 18 years of age at the time the crime is committed, or because the offender by reason of mental disease or defect, is unable to understand his impending death or the reasons for it.

Mindful of the concerns by many that a capital sentence may be imposed discriminatorily, this legislation also would require the court to instruct the jury that it shall not consider the race or color, national origin, or sex of the defendant, or the victim, and that the jury is not to recommend a sentence of death unless it has concluded that it would recommend a sentence of death for the crime in question regardless of the race of the defendant or the victim. To buttress the jury instructions, each juror would be required to file with the court, a certificate stating that the above-mentioned factors were not considered when reaching his or her individual decision on the imposition of the death penalty.

Capital punishment has long been a contentious issue. However, it is critical in ensuring an orderly society. The Senate has recently addressed this issue with the passage of S. 2455 mentioned previously. Accordingly, that is a recognition that capital punishment is indeed necessary to effectively deter crime. During my years as a public servant, especially during my service as district attorney for the city of Philadelphia, it has been clear that criminals are extremely concerned about the potential sentence they may receive for a criminal act. I have found the death penalty to be a deterrent to burglars and robbers carrying weapons for fear that there may be a killing with the attendant possibility of the death penalty.

The retribution inherent in capital punishment illustrates that the community will not tolerate the disregard of basic human values. Consequently, in light of the Court's affirmative determination of constitutionality of capital punishment, it is my sense that we should expeditiously reform the present statutory codification in order to provide the complete set of penalties originally intended by Congress.

Mr. President, at the present time there are many statutes on the Federal books on capital punishment covering treason, assassination of the President, murder, air piracy, to name a few. None is valid under the interpretations of the Supreme Court of the United States on the decisions handed down since 1972.

There was one effort at legislation in 1974 under the Air Piracy Act and that bill does not conform to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

In Furman versus Georgia and certain labor cases, the Supreme Court set down certain procedural standards that had to be complied with and there has not been an undating on this important legislation on the Federal books to comply with those Supreme Court decisions.

Mr. President, this legislation would establish compliance with those important rules of procedure articulated by the Supreme Court and would validate those statutes now on the books.

This legislation would add two offenses for capital punishment. One is a situation where a U.S. citizen is murdered by terrorists in the course of a terrorist act.

The second is where someone is serving a life sentence in the Federal penitentiary and commits an additional murder.

Mr. President, the detailed statement which I will offer in a moment contains the full statement of my reasons, but I will state in essence with the remaining time that I have left that this legislation is very important because of the strong public concern that there be an adequate deterrent to murder. Some 35 States have reenacted capital punishment after the Supreme Court decision in Furman versus Georgia and this Senator, while district attorney of Philadelphia was the vice chairman of the Pennsylvania Commission to reconsider the death penalty. The chairman of that Commission was the attorney general of the State, who was opposed to the death penalty, who was the appointing authority, the then-Governor of Pennsylvania, Governor Milton Shapp.

The minority views prevailed and the death penalty was reenacted in Pennsylvania because of public concern on this issue whic has been replicated in some 34 other States.

Mr. President, the experience that I have had as district attorney of Philadelphia has persuaded me that capital punishment is, in fact, a deterrent. One case is illustrative of many which I saw where would-be robbers and would-be burglars were reluctant to take along weapons for fear that a death would result and they would be liable, perhaps, for the death penalty.

There was a celebrated case, Mr. President, of Caters, Rivers, and Williams which was a robbery which three defendants perpetrated in Philadelphia in the late 1950's. Caters and Rivers were young men with marginal IQ's. Caters was 17 and Rivers was 18. They refused to go along on the robbery plan because Williams had a revolver.

Williams said, "Well, I won't take the gun with us." He put it in the drawer and slammed it shut and the three moved on to the scene of the robbery. But, unbeknownst to Caters and Rivers, Williams reached back into the drawer, pulled out the weapon, and put it in his pocket.

In the course of the robbery, Williams used the weapon and a murder ensued. All three received capital punishment. Caters and Rivers said in their statements that had they known that Williams was going to take the revolver, they would not have participated in the robbery because of their concern about capital punishment, about the death penalty.

The two men, Caters and Rivers, as I have indicated, had marginal IQ's, not really enormously adroit or enormously intelligent, but had sufficient capacity and understanding to refuse to go along on a robbery attempt if they faced the possibility of the death penalty.

Caters and Rivers, Mr. President, had their sentences commuted largely on the basis of that underlying concern. Their sentences were commuted to life imprisonment.

But I suggest, Mr. President, that that case is only illustrative of many cases, some of which this Senator has seen, where robbers do not want to carry weapons, were burgulars do not want to carry weapons because they are concerned that a killing may occur and they face the death penalty. My experience has convinced me that the death penalty is an effective deterrent and an appropriate weapon against murder.

Mr. President, I knew that there would not have been time, in the course of the 100th Congress, to consider this legislation, but this is a bill which this Senator intended to press in the 101st Congress. We need a comprehensive revision to the death penalty statutes on the Federal code which are there now but which are invalid. Accordingly, I urge my colleagues in support of this bill, and also unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was orderd to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 36

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. DEATH PENALTY PROCEDURES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Part II of title 18 of the United States Code is amended by adding the following new chapter after chapter 227:

"CHAPTER 228—DEATH SENTENCE

"Sec. 3591. Sentence of death.
"Sec. 3592. Procedures applicable to the death penalty.

"§ 3591. Sentence of death

"A defendant who has been found guilty of any offense for which a sentence of death is provided shall be sentenced to death only if a hearing is held in accordance with section 3592.

"§ 3592. Procedures applicable to the death penalty

"(a) NOTICE BY THE GOVERNMENT IN DEATH PENALTY CASES.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Whenever the Government intends to seek the death penalty for an offense for which one of the sentences provided is death, the attorney for the Government, a reasonable time before trial or acceptance by the court of a plea of guilty, shall sign and file with the court, and serve upon the defendant, a notice—

"(A) that the Government in the event of conviction will seek the sentence of death; and

"(B) setting forth the aggravating factors enumerated in subsection (g) and any other aggravating factors which the Government will seek to prove as the basis for the death penalty.

"(2) AMENDMENTS.—The court may permit the attorney for the Government to amend this notice for good cause shown.

"(b) HEARING BEFORE COURT OR JURY.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—When the attorney for the Government has filed a notice as required under subsection (a) and the defendant is found guilty of or pleads guilty to an offense for which one of the sentences provided is death, the judge who presided at the trial or before whom the guilty plea was entered, or any other judge if the judge who presided at the trial or before whom the guilty plea was entered is unavailable, shall conduct a separate sentencing hearing to determine the punishment to be imposed. The hearing shall be conducted—

"(A) before the jury which determined the defendant's guilt;

"(B) before a jury impaneled for the purpose of the hearing if—

"(i) the defendant was convicted upon a plea of guilty;

"(ii) the defendant was convicted after a trial before the court sitting without a jury;

"(iii) the jury which determined the defendant's guilt has been discharged for good cause; or

"(iv) after initial imposition of a sentence under this section, redetermination of the sentence under this section is necessary; or

"(C) before the court alone, upon the motion of the defendant and with the approval of the Government.

"(2) COMPOSITION OF JURY.—A jury impaneled pursuant to paragraph (1)(B) shall consist of 12 members, unless, at any time before the conclusion of the hearing, the parties stipulate with the approval of the court that it shall consist of any number less than 12.

"(c) PROOF OF AGGRAVATING AND MITIGATING FACTORS.—Notwithstanding rule 32(c) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, when a defendant is found guilty of or pleads guilty to an offense for which the sentence provided is death, no presentence report shall be prepared. In the sentencing hearing, information may be presented as to any matter relevant to the sentence and shall include matters relating to any of the aggravating or mitigating factors set forth in subsections (f) and (g), or any other mitigating factor. Where information is presented relating to any of the aggravating factors set forth in subsection (g), information may be presented relating to any other aggravating factor. Information presented may include the trial transcript and exhibits if the hearing is held before a jury or judge not present during the trial. Any other information relevant to such mitigating or aggravating factors may be presented by either the Government or the defendant regardless of its admissibility under the rules governing admission of evidence at criminal trials, except that information may be excluded if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury. The Government and the defendant shall be permitted to rebut any information received at the hearing and shall be given fair opportunity to present argument as to the adequacy of the information to establish the existence of any of the aggravating or mitigating factors and as to appropriateness in that case of imposing a sentence of death. The Government shall open the argument. The defendant shall be permitted to reply. The Government shall then be permitted to reply in rebuttal. The burden of establishing the existence of any aggravating factor is on the Government, and is not satisfied unless established beyond a reasonable doubt. The burden of establishing the existence of any mitigating factor is on the defendant, and is not satisfied unless established by a preponderance of the evidence.

"(d) RETURN OF FINDINGS.—The jury, or if there is no jury, the court, shall consider all the information received during the hearing. It shall return special findings identifying any aggravating factors set forth in subsection (g), found to exist. If one of the aggravating factors set forth in subsection (g)(1) and another of the aggravating factors set forth in paragraph (2) through (4) of subsection (g) is found to exist, a special finding identifying any other aggravating factor may be returned. A finding with respect to a mitigating factor may be made by one or more of the members of the jury, and any member of the jury who finds the existence of a mitigating factor may consider such a factor established for purposes of this subsection, regardless of the number of jurors who concur that the factor has been established. A finding with respect to any aggravating factor must be unanimous. If an aggravating factor set forth in subsection (g)(1) is not found to exist or an aggravating factor set forth in subsection (g)(1) is found to exist but no other aggravating factor set forth in subsection (g) is found to exist, the court shall impose a sentence, other than death, authorized by law. If an aggravating factor set forth in subsection (g)(1) and one or more of the other aggravating factors set forth in subsection (g) are found to exist, the jury, or if there is jury, the court, shall then consider whether the aggravating factor or factors found to exist sufficiently outweigh any mitigating factor or factors found to exist, or in the absence of mitigating factors whether the aggravating factors are themselves sufficient to impose a sentence of death. Based upon this consideration, the jury by unanimous vote, or if there is no jury, the court shall return a finding as to whether a sentence of death should be imposed.

"(e) IMPOSITION OF SENTENCE.—Upon a finding that a sentence of death should be imposed, the court shall sentence the defendant to death. Otherwise the court shall impose a sentence, other than death, authorized by law. A sentence of death shall not be carried out upon a person who is under 18 years of age at the time the crime was committed. A sentence of death shall not be carried out upon a person who, by reason of a mental disease or defect, is unable to understand his impending death or the reasons for it.

"(f) MITIGATING FACTORS.—In determining whether a sentence of death is to be imposed on a defendant, the following mitigating factors shall be considered but are not exclusive:

"(1) The defendant's capacity to appreciate the wrongfulness of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the requirements of law was significantly impaired, but not so impaired as to constitute a defense to the charge.

"(2) The defendant was under unusual and substantial duress, although not such duress as constitutes a defense to the charge.

"(3) The defendant is punishable as a principal (as defined in section 2(a) of title 18 of the United States Code) in the offense, which was committed by another, but the defendant's participation was relatively minor, although not so minor as to constitute a defense to the charge.

"(4) The defendant could not reasonably have foreseen that his conduct in the course of the commission of murder, or other offense resulting in death for which the defendant was convicted, would cause, or would create a grave risk of causing, death to any person.

"(g) AGGRAVATING FACTORS FOR HOMICIDE.—

"(1) GENERAL FACTORS.—Except as provided in paragraphs (2), (3), and (4), in determining whether a sentence of death should be imposed for an offense for which one of the sentences provided is death, the jury, or if there is no jury, the court shall consider each of the following aggravating factors which are not exclusive:

"(A) The defendant—

"(i) intentionally killed the victim;

"(ii) intentionally inflicted serious bodily injury which resulted in the death of the victim;

"(iii) intentionally engaged in conduct intending that the victim be killed or that lethal force be employed against the victim, which resulted in the death of the victim.

"(iv) intentionally engaged in conduct which—

"(I) the defendant knew would create a grave risk of death to a person, other than one of the participants in the offense; and

"(II) resulted in the death of the victim.

"(B) The defendant has been convicted of another Federal offense, or a State offense resulting in the death of a person, for which a sentence of life imprisonment or a sentence of death was authorized by statute.

"(C) The defendant has previosuly been convicted of two or more State or Federal offenses punishable by a term of imprisonment of more than one year, committed on different occasions, involving the infliction of, or attempted infliction of, serious bodily injury upon another person.

"(D) In the commission of the offense or in escaping apprehension for a violation of an offense for which a sentence of death is provided, the defendant knowingly created a grave risk of death to one or more persons in addition to the victim or victims of the offense.

"(E) The defendant procured the commission of the offense by payment, or promise of payment, of anything of pecuniary value.

"(F) The defendant committed the offense as consideration for the receipt, or in the expectation of the receipt, of anything of pecuniary value.

"(G) The defendant committed the offense after substantial planning and premeditation.

"(H) The victim was particularly vulnerable due to old age, youth, or infirmity.

"(I) The defendant committed the offense in an especially heinous, cruel, or depraved manner.

"(2) AGGRAVATING FACTORS FOR ESPIONAGE AND TREASON.—In determining whether a sentence of death should be imposed for an offense described in section 794, the jury, or if there is no jury, the court, shall consider each of the following aggravating factors and determine which, if any, exist:

"(A) the defendant has previously been convicted of another offense involving espionage or treason for which either a sentence of life imprisonment or death was authorized by statute;

"(B) in the commission of the offense the defendant knowingly created a grave risk of substantial danger to the national security; and

"(C) in the commission of the offense the defendant knowingly created a grave risk of death to another person.

The jury, or if there is no jury, the court, may consider whether any other aggravating factor exists.

"(3) AGGRAVATING FACTORS FOR HOMICIDE AND FOR ATTEMPTED MURDER OF THE PRESIDENT.—In determining whether a sentence of death should be imposed for an offense described in section 1751(c), the jury, or if there is no jury, the court, shall consider each of the following aggravating factors and determine which, if any, exist:

"(A) the death, or injury resulting in death, occurred during the commission or attempted commission of, or during the immediate flight from the commission of, an offense under section 751 (prisoners in custody of institution or officer), section 794 (gathering or delivering defense information to aid foreign government), section 844(d) (transportation of explosives in interstate commerce for certain purposes), section 844(f) (destruction of Government property in interstate commerce by explosives), section 1118 (prisoners serving life term), section 1201 (kidnaping), or section 2381 (treason of this title, or section 902 (i) or (n) of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958, as amended (49 U.S.C. 1472 (i) or (n)) (aircraft piracy);

"(B) the defendent committed the offense after substantial planning and premeditation to cause the death of a person or commit an act of terrorism; or

"(C) the defendant committed the offense against—

"(i) the President of the United States, the President-elect, the Vice President, the Vice-President-elect, the Vice-President-designate, or, if there is no Vice President, the officer next in order of succession to the office of the President of the United States, or any person who is acting as President under the Constitution and laws of the United States;

"(ii) a chief of state, head of government, or the political equivalent, of a foreign nation;

"(iii) a foreign official listed in section 1116(b)(3)(A) of this title, if he is in the Untied States on official business; or

"(iv) a Federal public servant who is a judge, a law enforcement officer, or an employee of a United States penal or correctional institution—

"(I) while he is engaged in the performance of his official duties;

"(II) because of the performance of his official duties; or

"(III) because of his status as a public servant.

For purposes of this subparagraph, a 'law enforcement officer' is a public servant authorized by law or by a Government agency or Congress to conduct or engage in the prevention, investigation, or prosecution of an offense.

"(4) AGGRAVATING FACTORS FOR MURDER BY A FEDERAL PRISONER.—In determining whether a sentence of death shall be imposed for an offense described in section 1118, the jury, or if there is no jury, the court, shall consider each of the following aggravating factors and determine which, if any, exist:

"(A) the defendant committed the offense during the course of seizing, confining, inveigling, decoying, kidnaping, abducting, carrying away, holding hostage, or holding for ransom or otherwise any person;

"(B) the death or injury resulting in death occurred during the commission or attempted commission of, or during the immediate flight from the commission or attempted commission of, an offense under section 751 (escape by prisoner in custody of institution or officer);

"(C) the defendant committed the offense during the course of perpetrating or attempting to perpetrate a sexual assault on any person;

"(D) the defendant committed the offense during the course, of, on account of, or as a result of any transaction concerning or distribution of any controlled substance as defined by schedules I, II, III, IV, and V of section 812 of title 21;

"(E) the defendant committed the offense while armed with, or having readily available, a firearm, as defined in section 921(a)(3) of this title; and

"(F) the defendant committed the offense during the course of inciting, organizing, promoting, encouraging, participating in, carrying out, or aiding or abetting any person inciting, participating in, or carrying on a riot as defined in section 2102 of this title.

"(h) RIGHT OF THE DEFENDANT TO JUSTICE WITHOUT DISCRIMINATION.—In any hearing held before a jury under this section, the court shall instruct the jury that in its consideration of whether the sentence of death should be imposed it shall not consider the race, color, national origin, or sex of the defendant or the victim, and that the jury is not to recommend a sentence of death unless it has concluded that it would recommend a sentence of death for the crime in question no matter what race the defendant, or the victim, may be. The jury shall return to the court a certificate signed by each juror that consideration of race, color, national origin, creed, or sex of the defendant or the victim was not involved in reaching his or her individual decision, and that the individual juror would have made the same recommendation regarding a sentence for the crime in question no matter what race the defendant, or the victim, may be.

"(i) APPEAL IN CAPITAL CASES.—

"(1) REVIEW.—In any case in which the sentence of death is imposed under this section, the sentence of death shall be subject to review by the court of appeals upon appeal by the defendant. Notice of appeal must be filed within the time prescribed for appeal of judgment in section 2107 of title 28, United States Code. An appeal under this section may be consolidated with an appeal of the judgment of conviction. Such review shall have priority over all other cases.

"(2) MATTERS TO BE CONSIDERED.—On review of the sentence, the court of appeals shall consider the record, the evidence submitted during the trial, the information admitted during the sentencing hearing, the procedures employed in the sentencing hearing, and the special findings returned under this section.

"(3) AFFIRMING OR REMANDING THE SENTENCE.—The court shall affirm the sentence if it determines that—

"(A) the sentence of death was not imposed under the influence of passion, prejudice, or any other arbitrary factor; and

"(B) the information supports the special finding of the existence of every aggravating factor upon which the sentence was based, together with or the failure to find any mitigating factors as set forth or allowed in this section.

In all other cases the court shall remand the case for reconsideration under this section. The court of appeals shall state in writing the reasons for its disposition of the review of the sentence.

"(4) APPOINTMENT OF COUNSEL.—In any post-conviction proceeding under section 2254 or 2255 of title 28, United States Code seeking to vacate or set aside a death sentence, the court shall appoint counsel to represent any defendant who is or becomes financially unable to obtain adequate representation.

"(j) REFUSAL TO PARTICIPATE BY STATE AND FEDERAL CORRECTIONAL EMPLOYEES.—No employee of any State department of corrections or the Federal Bureau of Prisons and no employee providing services to that department or bureau under contract shall be required, as a condition of that employment, or contractual obligation to be in attendance at or to participate in any execution carried our under this section if such participation is contrary to the moral or religious convictions of the employee. For purposes of this subsection, the term 'participation in executions' includes personal preparation of the condemned individual and the apparatus used for execution and supervison of the activities of other personnel in carrying out such activities.

"(k) IMPLEMENTATION OF A SENTENCE OF DEATH.—A person who has been sentenced to death pursuant to the provisions of this section shall be committed to the custody of the Attorney General until exhaustion of the procedures for appeal of the judgement of conviction and for review of the sentence. When the sentence is to be implemented, the Attorney General shall release the person sentenced to death to the custody of a United States marshal, who shall supervise implementation of the sentence in the manner prescribed by the law of the State in which the sentence is imposed. UNFAIR FOREIGN COMPETITION

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I am today introducing the Unfair Foreign Competition Act of 1989. This legislation would give American industries direct access to Federal courts to halt promptly the injurious import of products which are dumped subsidized, or in violation of our customs laws, and to recover monetary damages for such abuses.

The Substance of the Unfair Competition Act of 1989 has previously been considered by the Senate. On March 4, 1982, I introduced S. 2167 to provide a private right of action in Federal court to enforce existing laws prohibiting illegal dumping or subsidizing of foreign imports. Hearings were held on this bill before the Judiciary Committee on May 24 and June 24, 1982. On December 15, 1982, I offered the text of this bill on the Senate floor as an amendment, which was tabled by a slim margin of 51 or 47.

During the 98th Congress, I reintroduced this legislation as S. 418 on February 3, 1983. The Judiciary Committee held a hearing on this bill on March 21, 1983. I offered the text of S. 418 as an amendment to the omnibus tariff bill on September 19, 1984; the amendment was tabled.

During the 99th Congress, I reintroduced this legislation as S. 236; I expanded the scope of this bill to include customs fraud violations and introduced S. 1655 on September 18, 1985. The Judiciary Committee held a hearing on S. 1655 on November 20, 1985, and favorably reported the bill by unanimous voice vote on March 20, 1986. The Finance Subcommittee on International Trade also held a hearing on S. 1655 pursuant to a sequential referral agreement. Significant progress was made toward reaching a unanimous-consent agreement for full Senate consideration of S. 1655 prior to adjournment of the 99th Congress, but the press of other business prevented its coming up for floor action.

Mr. President, the House of Representatives considered during the 99th Congress H.R. 4800, the omnibus trade bill, which included a similar provision, to wit a limited private right of action provision proposed by Representative GUARINI. The Guarini amendment allows a U.S. manufacturer, producer, or wholesaler to file suit in the Court of International Trade for damages from defendants against whom an antidumping order is issued. The House passed H.R. 4800 with overwhelming bipartisan support on May 22, 1986. The omnibus trade bill, including the Guarini amendment, was introduced as H.R. 3 on January 6, 1987.

In the 100th Congress, I reintroduced this legislation as S. 361 to provide a private right of action in Federal court to enforce existing laws prohibiting illegal dumping or customs fraud.

I expanded the scope of this bill revising the subsidy provision in S. 1396 to include a private right of action to allow injured American parties to sue in Federal court for injunctive relief against, and monetary damages from, foreign manufacturers and exporters who receive subsidies, and any importer related to the manufacturer or exporter.

This bill would have provided a comprehensive approach to address three of the most pernicious unfair export strategies used by foreign companies against American companies dumping, subsidies, and customs fraud.

During full Senate consideration of the Omnibus Trade and Competitiveness Act (S. 490), I filed the text of S. 1396 as amendment No. 315 on June 19, 1987, and offered it as an amendment to the trade bill on June 25, 1987. This amendment, however, was tabled. I also filed the Unfair Foreign Competition Act as amendment No. 3314 on September 29, 1988, to the Technical Corrections Act of 1988 (S. 2238).

The unlawful dumping of foreign goods, which involves sales in the United States at artificially low prices, has become a serious threat to American industries. Enormous quantities of dumped and subsidized products, and articles which violate the customs laws, enter the United States each year. Existing laws prohibiting such illegal imports are not being adequately enforced, and do not provide remedies sufficient to compensate injured parties or deter future unlawful conduct. As a result, domestic companies are suffering increasing injury, and thousands of American jobs are lost to illegal imports each year.

The bill I introduce today would address this problem by permitting injured American businesses to file suit in Federal court and seek injunctions against, and appropriate damages for these illegal foreign trade practices. On November 20, 1985, the Judiciary Committee held a hearing on this bill's predecessor, S. 1655. Representatives of various domestic industries, including steel, textiles, and apparel, strongly supported enactment of this legislation. Legal experts testified about the urgent need for a private right of action in Federal court to supplement the current administrative practices.

American industries under this bill would be granted direct access to Federal court to seek swift injunctive relief against illegal imports. The availability to U.S. companies of injunctive relief would place foreign "dumpers" on notice that any investment in dumping in the United States would be lost instantaneously.

Under this bill, an injured domestic business could file suit in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia or the Court of International Trade for an injunction against the import and sales of the goods which it could preliminarily demonstrate were being dumped or subsidized. The court's order could be modified to provide a more permanent remedy based on a more detailed finding.

During the 1985 Judiciary Committee hearing, witnesses testified regarding the provision of the bill creating injunctive relief to halt illegal imports. Industry representatives indicated that, under existing law, a complaint about unfair dumped or subsidized imports must proceed through a costly and lengthy administrative procedure involving both the Commerce Department and the International Trade Commission; likewise, the Bureau of Customs is increasingly unable to cope with the rising incidence of customs fraud, primarily transshipments through third countries to circumvent a U.S. quota. Although injunctive relief would be a significant alternative to the current administrative process to halt illegal imports, the remedy of primary interest to the witnesses was the retroactive damages provision of the bill.

The availability under this bill of damages to U.S. companies, if dumping and injury are ultimately found to have occurred, will remove the illegally obtained profits of, and increase the cost of dumping for, importers and foreign exporters and producers. Foreign enterprises, like any domestic company, would be held responsible for the economic consequences of their anticompetitive actions.

The current regulatory scheme rarely imposes retroactive duties; it merely restricts future dumping. This bill would allow domestic companies to recover damages for injuries sustained when injunctive relief cannot be timely provided or is otherwise inadequate.

During the 1985 Judiciary Committee hearing, witnesses testified that the bill's provision to seek damages for injury from illegal imports would provide a more effective deterrent than current law, would provide retroactive relief to fill the gap under existing law which imposes duties on only future imports, and would provide damage awards directly to the injured American industries. International trade lawyers also testified during the hearing that the provision of damages for injury sustained from illegal dumped or subsidized imports or customs fraud violations would be consistent with the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT).

By the Government's own admission, customs fraud is rampant with regard to textiles, apparel, computer software, hand tools, sugar, electronics, automotive products, chemicals, petrochemicals, agricultural products, pharmaceutical products, and other industries. Illegal dumping is severely injuring American steel, chemical, glass, textile, electronics, agriculture, rubber and cement industries, among others. Foreign subsidies injure American manufacturers of footwear, steel, textiles, apparel, glass, wool, leather, tires, cement, sugar, iron, railway, cars, and other products.

Customs violations appear in several pernicious forms. Massive country-of-origin fraud occurs, whereby a country which has reached its permissible quota for a given item or product circumvents the quota by transshipping the continued imports through another country which has not yet reached its quota. Most commonly—indeed, in hundreds of thousands of cases—imports are fraudulently mislabeled. Given the sheer volume of imports and the limited resources of the Customs Service, many imported textiles, apparel, and footwear simply are declared to be something which they are not, or are immensely underdisclosed in number—again, in order to evade quotas fixed by the administration.

The Customs Service's Office of Commercial Fraud Enforcement reports that as of September 1, 1988, there were over 3,600 open customs fraud cases. Of these cases, only 559 were accepted by the Office of Enforcement for Investigation, and only 167 grand jury subpoenas were issued.

The Commercial Fraud Enforcement Office also reports that there were more seizures in fiscal year 1988 for textile and apparel violations than for any other violation. The value of these 953 seizures totaled over $56 million. Even more disturbing, the Customs Service estimated that the value of all textile and apparel imports in violation of customs laws was $518 million during that same time period. That figure is expected to rise to $563 million by 1990.

Mr. President, we should not be surprised by recent protectionist calls for new tariffs against goods from countries with large trade surpluses with the United States. I sympathize with the frustrations which lead to such efforts, even as I question their appropriateness. The way to avert such counterproductive measures is to enforce the trade laws which are already in place. This bill will greatly increase the enforcement of those laws, by letting injured American businesses go directly to Federal court—just as they can for violations of the antitrust laws—and seek quick injunctions against continued illegal importation.

The bill I introduced today would in no way interfere with the administration's pursuit of voluntary import restraints. It would offer no new tariffs or quotas or protectionist barriers. It would not displace any existing remedies through the ITC or otherwise. Rather, it would reduce the pressures for resort to such disfavored measures, by allowing vigorous enforcement of laws already on the books.

Mr. President, there is nothing like the vigor of private plaintiffs when it comes to enforcement of trade laws or other means of self-help which have long been demonstrated to be the most effective way to get enforcement and action by those who are most directly affected and injured. We have many decades of evidence of this with regard to private enforcement of our antitrust laws. The theory that private plaintiffs would find strong incentive to bring such antitrust suits—and in so doing would both recoup deserved compensation for their injuries and advance strong national public policy interests—certainly has proved correct. There is no reason that the same would not be true of private suits to enforce our international trade laws.

The legal process is well attuned to this kind of an effective remedy. The case of Marathon versus Mobil Oil is an illustration of a case which involved a complex, factual legal situation which was decided by the U.S. district court in Cleveland in the course of some 6 weeks. It is important to emphasize that once such injunctions are issued they stay in effect and no goods can be shipped in violation of those prohibitions while any appeal is pending. That is so because the order of the district court remains in effect unless and until a supersedeas is ordered, which is not a practical reality given the requirement of posting a bond and the substantial sums of money involved in these matters. Similarly, the Federal discovery procedures lend an excellent avenue for injured U.S. interests to seek discovery from any importer who wants to utilize our markets. If importers wish to do business in the United States, they ought to be subject to the jurisdiction of our courts for equitable relief. They ought to be subject to telling specifically what has happened in terms of subsidies or dumping or in terms of the circuity and violations of the customs laws which are applicable in so many situations.

This is an effective remedy because it does not address the problem after the fact. It stops goods from coming into this country before they can displace American products and American jobs.

We desperately need the vigorous private enforcement this bill would spur if we are to successfully chart a course between the grave dangers of increased protectionism and the certain peril which would result from unabated illegal foreign imports. Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to join in supporting this bill.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEC. 2. ACCORDANCE WITH GATT.

It is the sense of the Congress that the provisions of this Act are consistent with, and in accord with, the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT).

PROTECTION OF SOCIAL SECURITY BENEFITS FROM THE "NOTCH" EFFECT

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, today I am reintroducing legislation to amend title II of the Social Security Act, to restore benefit equity to those members of our society born between 1917 and 1921, the so-called notch babies. I am aware of the budget constraints facing us this year, but this bill is necessary in addressing the unfair treatment of those retired workers affected by the notch disparity.

The bill I am introducing today is designed to eliminate the disparity resulting from changes made in 1977 in the Social Security benefit computation formula. This legislation is identical to S. 1119, which I introduced in the 100th Congress. I also joined Senator SANFORD as an original cosponsor in introducing S. 1830 a more modest notch initiative on October 29, 1987.

Senior citizens across the country, in addition to the many senior citizen organizations, have mobilized to protect and preserve their benefits from the budget ax, and to recoup those Social Security benefits lost due to a gross error in the automatic benefit increase provision enacted in 1972.

In 1977, Congress approved a plan designed to eliminate a perceived overadjustment for inflation contained in the then-existing plan. This provided a new benefit formula for workers born after 1916. To protect people from an abrupt change in benefits, a transition formula was included in the new plan. This transition formula would have provided for a smooth changeover by dividing Social Security beneficiaries into three categories: those born before 1917, those born between 1917 and 1921—the notch years—and those born after 1921.

The transition formula failed. Supporters of the plan knew benefits under the new plan would be lower—that was the idea—but they grossly underestimated the disparity they would be creating for the notch babies. Under the formula, benefits were supposed to be 5 to 7 percent less than those projected under the 1972 law. Instead, workers with the same earnings record, retiring at the age of 65, and born only a few days apart, one in 1916 and one in 1917, experienced a difference in benefits of up to $1,300 each year.

The Social Security Administration reports that of the nearly 24 million retired American workers currently receiving benefits, approximately 6.6 million are and will be affected by the notch disparity.

The failure of the transition guarantee to protect those born in the notch years is primarily due to two provisions of the formula. First, post-age 62 earnings of people born after 1916 are excluded when calculating the benefits for these workers. Second, benefit increases occurring before the year a worker reached age 62 are not factored into his or her initial benefits, as they would have been under the former rules.

Several bills have been introduced in previous Congresses that were aimed at addressing these limitations in an effort to correct the notch baby inequity. The bill I am introducing today incorporates the best provisions of these bills and thus addresses the notch problem in a comprehensive fashion. The legislation removes the restriction on including post-age 62 earnings in the computation of benefits. It also effectively negates the provision denying the notch babies the same benefit increases other retirees enjoy and provides for a lump-sum retroactive payment for those who have not been allowed to factor in benefit increases since 1979.

The time has arrived for us to restore benefit equity and send a strong message to senior citizens that this body will preserve and protect all benefits which our elderly so richly deserve. Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to join in supporting this vital legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE STATUTORY CIA INSPECTOR GENERAL ACT, THE NATIONAL INTELLIGENCE REORGANIZATION ACT, AND THE NATIONAL SECURITY REFORM ACT

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I am reintroducing today three bills which I originally proposed on October 27, 1987, during the 100th Congress. The first of these bills constitutes a division from my proposed National Security Reform Act (S. 1818), which I shall refer to as the Central Intelligence Agency Inspector General Act. The second bill represents an update of my National Intelligence Reorganization Act (S. 1820). The third bill is my proposed National Security Reform Act (S. 1818) minus the CIA inspector general provision.

Each of my original bills served, I believe, as a useful catalyst in enacting legislation or in generating debate and discussion on national security matters with my colleagues, members of academia and present and former government officials.

Portions of the legislation relating to the CIA inspector general, originally introduced as S. 1818, the National Security Reform Act, were enacted into law. These provisions, incorporated into the Intelligence Authorization Act of 1989, were signed into law by President Reagan on September 28, 1988, after being passed by both Houses of Congress. These provisions specified that the Director of Central Intelligence shall furnish to the Intelligence Committees the following reports relating to the activities of the inspector general:

First, a report made at the time any inspector general is selected by the DCI, specifying the name and background of the person selected and a certification that such selection was made without regard to political affiliation.

Second, a report made at the time any inspector general is removed by the DCI and the basis for such removal.

Third, semiannual reports, to be furnished not later than June 30 and December 31 of each year, summarizing the activities of the Office of Inspector General to include descriptions of any violations of laws or regulations and the status of corrective actions taken.

29-059 O-90-14 (Pt. 1)

Fourth, a report of any decision made by the Director of Central Intelligence to prohibit the IG from initiating, carrying out, or completing any audit, inspection, or investigation within the CIA, to be made within 7 days of such decision.

Fifth, a report within 7 days of any other decision made by the DCI which would substantially affect the ability of the inspector general to carry out his duties and responsibilities. This report shall include the position of the inspector general with respect to such decision.

The first bill I am introducing today denominate as the Central Intelligence Agency's Inspector General Act and includes the balance of the inspector general provisions of S. 1818 as revised. Essentially, these provisions include:

First, creation in law of a CIA Office of Inspector General accountable to the Congress.

Second, appointment of the inspector general by the President with the advise and consent of the Senate.

Third, removal of the inspector general only by the President.

Fourth, empowering the IG to issue subpoenas as necessary to carry out his responsibilities.

The purpose of the expanded provisions for a CIA inspector general is to improve the credibility of the CIA and therefore, to improve its effectiveness by requiring independence of the CIA inspector general by mandating that the IG report directly to the Congress.

The second bill I am introducing, Mr. President, is the National Intelligence Reorganization Act, which I also originally introduced in the 100th Congress as S. 1820. As I indicated earlier, this legislation has drawn broad interest especially from academia and former senior government officials. For example, on March 3, 1988, Georgetown's Foreign Service Graduate School sponsored a 1-day symposium on this comprehensive legislation which, in my view, greatly improves the management structure and control of the activities and vast resources of our country's intelligence agencies and departments. Several Presidents since President Eisenhower and past Senate Intelligence Committees have been trying to define more clearly the missions, structure and management of the intelligence community into a more cohesive, integrated and efficient force for national security. Unfortunately, the effort has been only marginally successful; a more comprehensive change is long overdue and the National Intelligence Reorganization Act will serve this end.

I have also consulted with a broad spectrum of former senior government officials from the field of intelligence and national security. In particular, I have placed great value in the counsel provided by former Secretary of Defense, Clark Clifford, who was the principal framer of the 1947 National Security Act which created the CIA. In my view, there is no wiser counsel in America's national security affairs than Mr. Clifford, who has offered several recommendations which I have incorporated into the legislation. I am including for the RECORD, a copy of my June 20, 1988, letter to Mr. Clifford and his July 19, 1988, response.

I am introducing a third bill which is a part of S. 1818. When I first introduced the National Security Reform Act legislation, the administration was in the midst of a major crisis arising from the sale of arms to Iran. That matter illustrated the willingness of certain members of the executive branch to thwart the spirit and letter of the law, in this case, the Intelligence Oversight Act of 1980. That law required the executive branch to report covert actions in a "timely fashion" to the Intelligence Oversight Committees. There was a wise rationale behind this law. It was to provide the President the benefit of congressional counsel before undertaking foreign policy action which might be unwise. As we all painstakingly learned, congressional notification was bypassed and the President and the country were thrust into a major crisis of confidence and credibility. The rest is history.

Consequently, in an unusual Saturday session of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence on June 27, 1987, members of the committee had an extended debate on legislative measures which might be needed to help ensure that the country is spared another badly conceived Iran-Contra affair. There was near unanimous agreement that the current law on the reporting of covert action to the Congress needed clarification and restructuring. During the debate I offered ideas and language which I later incorporated into a legislative proposal, the National Security Reform Act. Several of these proposals were also incorporated into the comprehensive intelligence oversight bill, S. 1721, which bill overwhelmingly passed the U.S. Senate by a vote of 71 to 19 on March 15, 1988. My legislation differs from S. 1721 in several significant respects. First, I call for the President to inform the Congress within 24 hours instead of 48 hours of any finding he may sign authorizing covert action. I believe that while the 24-hour standard is more stringent, it will provide the opportunity for more timely congressional counsel. The earlier there is congressional input, the better, because it will have a greater likelihood of reversing any unwise Executive action. Clearly, there will be times when key congressional leaders will not be available in which case I would expect a good faith effort of notification. Second, I am in favor of Presidential notification of eight instead of four designated congressional leaders to include the chairmen and ranking minority members of the Senate and House Intelligence Committees. I firmly believe that the Intelligence Committee leaders will understand more fully the nature of the proposed action from their current experience in intelligence matters and will provide valuable insights from such experience.

Regrettably, the Iran-Contra affair also demonstrated the willingness of certain executive branch members to deceive the Congress. Nothing I heard during the Iran-Contra proceedings troubled me more than this deceit. Such acts, if allowed to go unchecked, will only foster more deceit and will represent the initial divisive cracks in the Constitution's call for a system of checks and balances. Therefore, I am again including in the National Security Reform Act a provision to require mandatory penalties where executive branch officials make false statements to congressional committees. The first bill to create an independent inspector general with expanded powers follows, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Central Intelligence Agency Act of 1949 (50 U.S.C. 403a et seq.) is amended by deleting all after Sec. 16 and adding the following:

"INSPECTOR GENERAL FOR THE CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE AGENCY

"SEC. 17. (a) PURPOSE; ESTABLISHMENT.—In order to create an objective and effective unit, appropriately accountable to the Congress, to initiate and conduct independently, inspections, investigation and audits relating to programs and operations of the Central Intelligence Agency, there is hereby established in the CIA an office of Inspector General.

"(b) APPOINTMENT AND REMOVAL.—There shall be at the head of the Office an Inspector General who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Such appointment shall also be made on the basis of demonstrated ability in accounting, financial analysis, law, management or public adminstration. The Inspector General shall report directly to and be under the general supervision of the Director of Central Intelligence.

"(c) The Director may prohibit the Inspector General from initiating, carrying out, or completing any audit, inspection or investigation, or from issuing any subpoena, concerning ongoing operations only, and only if he determines that such prohibition is necessary to protect vital national security interests of the United States.

"(B) to keep the Director fully and currently informed concerning violations of laws and regulations, fraud and other serious problems, abuses and deficiencies and to report the progress made in implementing corrective action.

"(2) In the event the Inspector General is unable to resolve any differences with the Director on the execution of his duties and powers, he shall report such matter to the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence and the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence within seven (7) days.

"(g) The Inspector General shall have the power to issue subpoenas, as may be necessary, to carry out his work. In addition, he shall have direct access to all records and direct and prompt access to the Director when necessary for any purpose pertaining to the performance of his duties.

"(i) Classified semiannual reports of the Inspector General shall be furnished to the Director who shall transmit them to the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence and to the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence Representatives within 30 days after receipt, together with any comments he deems appropriate."

NATIONAL INTELLIGENCE REORGANIZATION

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, the second bill is the National Intelligence Reorganization Act. A more detailed statement of it's purpose follows:

This bill would enhance considerably the objectivity and reliability of our Nation's intelligence, which the events of the past 3 years have demonstrated to be woefully lacking. It would greatly improve the management structure and control of the activities and vast resources of our country's intelligence agencies and departments.

This bill is based on S. 1820 which I introduced in the 100th Congress and on which I testified before the Senate Intelligence Committee on November 1987.

In his Iran-Contra testimony, Secretary of State George Shultz summarized, in very clear terms; the principal problem with U.S. intelligence. "[One is] the importance of separating the function of gathering and analyzing intelligence from the function of developing and carrying out policy. If the two things are mixed together, it is too tempting to have your analysis and selection of information that's presented favor the policy that you're advocating "Secretary Shultz went on to say that, long before the Iran-Contra events came to light, he already had come to have grave doubts about the objectivity and reliability of some of the intelligence he was receiving precisely because the people who supplied it were too deeply involved in advocating and carrying out policy.

In the 40 years since passage of the National Security Act the Directors of Central Intelligence have been tested repeatedly on their ability to maintain a delicate separation of two competing responsibilities. On the one hand, the Director of Central Intelligence [DCI] has been expected to provide unvarnished intelligence information to the President and other foreign policymakers. On the other hand, he has been asked to be a participant in the making and execution of foreign policy through covert actions. If history has taught us anything, it is that the desired separation cannot and has not been maintained. It is unrealistic and probably unfair to expect our Nation's senior intelligence officer to be the purveyor of objective, unbiased information upon which the President and Secretary of State may formulate a foreign policy, while at the same time charging him to influence and implement that policy in the form of covert action.

The problem is particularly acute when the DCI is a foreign policy activist. Director William Casey was not the first Director of Central Intelligence who desired to be involved to some degree in the formulation or implementation of foreign policy, nor is he likely to be the last. Recognizing this, we should take steps to ensure, to the greatest degree possible, some structural separation of the DCI's current function. We simply cannot afford to have two Secretaries of State, two foreign policymakers who may be attempting to move the country in different directions, one overtly and the other covertly. No one is well served by this contradiction—not the President, not the Congress and not the country.

Now we have a choice, we can preserve the status quo and hope that the current Director of Central Intelligence—and each of his successors—will understand the lessions of the Iran-Contra affair. Or we can create a better system of checks and balances on covert action undertaking. It is up to the Congress to clarify in the law what we expect the Director of Central Intelligence and the CIA to do and not to do. We can do this by providing an organizational framework designed to permit the Director of Central Intelligence to provide objective, reliable and coordinated intelligence to provide objective, reliable and coordinated intelligence to policymakers in a timely manner. However, we must make it clear to the Director—not simply the current one but to all future ones—that it is not the DCI's function to formulate and implement foreign policy.

This bill accomplishes these purposes by:

First, amendment the National Security Act of 1947 to make clear that the principal role of foreign intelligence and of the agencies who provide such intelligence is to ensure the provision of objective, reliable, coordinated and timely information upon which the President and other senior foreign policymakers may base sound foreign policy decisions.

Second, relieving the Director of Central Intelligence of the responsibility for implementing covert actions but charging him with responsibility for overseeing the conformity of such actions with applicable laws and regulations.

Third, establishing the position of "Director of the Central Intelligence Agency" to manage the CIA on a full time basis and to implement cover actions directed by the President.

As I already have stated, this bill will greatly enhance the management of the activities and vast resources of our several intelligence departments and agencies. In 1947, President Truman, mindful of the President's need for intelligence and of Pearl Harbor's bitter lesson stemming from uncoordinated and poorly disseminated intelligence, formed an agency to centralize intelligence. The position of Director of Central Intelligence was created to head the new Central Intelligence Agency and to coordinate the activities of the intelligence entities in existence. Those entities consisted of the intelligence services of the Army and Navy, a small bureau in the State Department and remnants of the OSS. Since 1947, that coordination task has grown enormously with the addition of complex technology, the commitment of vast resources and the establishment of many large, secretive and organizationally complex departments and agencies.

Since John F. Kennedy, several Presidents have directed their Director of Central Intelligence to devote the bulk of their time to the intelligence community. For a number of reasons this has not happened. Suffice it to say that, in some cases. DCI's have found the operational role of the CIA more glamorous than managing an intelligence community composed of agencies and departments opposed to centralized direction. Events such as Watergate, congressional investigations of wrongdoings, and the turnover of DCI's, also have contributed to the neglect.

Today, the intelligence community as it is called, consists of the Central Intelligence Agency, the Defense Intelligence Agency, the National Security Agency, the large foreign intelligence and counterintelligence elements of the Army, Navy, Air Force and Marine Corps, offices for the collection of specialized intelligence through reconnaissance, the FBI's Foreign Counterintelligence Division, the State Department's Bureau of Intelligence and Research and elements of the Treasury and Energy Departments. These organizations provide what we call national foreign intelligence. There are other elements in the Government, mostly within the Defense Department, which run a vast system of tactical intelligence nearly as complex and as expensive as that of the national foreign intelligence world. Outside of the Government, there is another world of contractors who design and develop these complex intelligence system and, in some cases, operate them for the intelligence agencies.

Make no mistake about my remarks. These agencies and programs are critical to our national security. The country needs them. But their budgets are in the billions; their growth in terms of people is the greatest in the history of U.S. intelligence; their mission and challenges now and for the foreseeable future are so demanding, complex, and interdependent that their management and leadership can no longer be accomplished by a Director of Central Intelligence who also must manage a large agency such as the CIA.

The Intelligence Oversight Committees which review the programs and budgets of the intelligence community have clearly identified management of the intelligence community as critical issue. In 1976, the Select Committee to study Government operations with respect to intelligence—the predecessor to the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence—"found concern that the function of DCI in his roles as intelligence community leader and principal intelligence adviser to the President is inconsistent with his responsibilities to manage one of the intelligence community agencies—the CIA." The committee also expressed concern that the DCI's new span of control—both the entire intelligence community and the entire CIA—may be too great for him to exercise effective detailed supervision of clandestine activities. Those concerns are even greater today than they were 13 years ago, because of the greater challenges and costs facing intelligence, the growing competition for resources and the unacceptable risks to U.S. foreign policy.

To address this problem, the bill I am introducing today also:

Changes the title of the "Director of Central Intelligence" to the "Director of National Intelligence" to reflect the new, more important status of this position—the title is not new; it was first proposed by the Senate Intelligence Committee in 1980;

Establishes the Director of National Intelligence as the primary adviser to the President on national foreign intelligence and as the full-time manager of the intelligence community with clearly defined statutory responsibilities and authorities for the foreign intelligence effort;

Makes the Director of National Intelligence a statutory member of the National Security Council to ensure that he is aware of emerging issues for which there is an intelligence need and to ensure that there is an objective intelligence base for national security and foreign policy decisions being contemplated;

Ensures that the position of the Director of National Intelligence as leader of the intelligence community is not a hollow one, by giving the position not only the statutory authority to approve and submit the intelligence community program, resources and budget, but also to task all intelligence collection and analytical resources;

Eliminates the need for a Director of the Intelligence Community staff since that 237-person staff plus other offices and personnel would report directly to the Director of National Intelligence.

Finally, I endorse completely the view expressed by Judge Webster, the present CIA Director, that the Agency's directorship should not change every time a new President is elected. This gives rise to charges that the position has been politicized and that there is an inadequate institutional memory of lessons learned from the past. In the past 15 years there have been 7 heads of the CIA and only 2 of these were career intelligence officers. We cannot afford a generalized loss of confidence in the CIA's objectivity and reliability, because of the politicization of its analysis such as was expressed by Secretary of State Shultz, to ensure a more professional approach to intelligence activities and analysis, to reduce the risk of politicization and to protect against the dangers of an intelligence "czar," this bill also would:

Create a fixed, 7-year tenure for the Director of the Central Intelligence Agency.

Require that at least one of the positions of Director or Deputy Director of the Central Intelligence Agency be filled by a career intelligence officer from the intelligence community.

I am not proposing that the Director of National Intelligence be tenured because I believe that the President should have the right to select individuals who are to serve as his primary advisers. I believe that with a separate and tenured Director of the CIA and with other intelligence agency heads not under the administrative control of the Director of National Intelligence (the Directors of the National Security Agency and the defense intelligence agencies are appointed by the Secretary of Defense), we would have a better system of checks and balances against politicization of intelligence.

The beginning of a new administration is a particularly propitious time to consider this reorganization issue. Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to join in support of this legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill and the referenced correspondence with Mr. Clifford be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"(7) to protect the security of its installations, activities, information, property, and employees by appropriate means, including such investigations of applicants, employees, contractors, and other persons with similar associations with the Central Intelligence Agency as are necessary; and

"(8) to conduct such administrative and technical support activities within and outside the United States as are necessary to perform the functions described in paragraphs (1) through (7), including procurement and essential cover and proprietary arrangements.".

SEC. (a) Section 5313 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by—

(1) changing Director of Central Intelligence to read Director of National Intelligence;

(2) adding at the end thereof the following:

"Director of the Central Intelligence Agency.".

(b) Section 5314 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"Deputy Director of the Central Intelligence Agency.".

SEC. 6. The provision of section 102a of the Act relating to the Director of the Intelligence Community staff is repealed.

SEC. 7. The Central Intelligence Act of 1949 is amended by changing references to the Director or Deputy Director of Central Intelligence to mean the Director or Deputy Director of the Central Intelligence Agency.

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, June 20, 1988.

Mr. CLARK CLIFFORD,
815 Connecticut Avenue NW.,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CLIFFORD: As you may be aware, in 1987 I introduced legislation to improve the effectiveness and objectiveness of national intelligence, principally through reorganization.

In view of the fact that your November 20, 1987 letter to the Senate Intelligence Committee suggested an organizational change—separation of the functions of the nation's chief intelligence officer and the director of the CIA, I would appreciate your views on the legislation in its entirety and on its specific features.

1987 marked the 40th anniversary of a historic piece of legislation in which you played so pivotal a role. The National Security Act has brought order and organization to our defense and national security apparatus and has served the nation well. But, in light of lessons learned over 40 years, the missions and structure for intelligence are in need of update for two very important reasons. For one, the number of intelligence agencies have multiplied since 1947 and the nature of intelligence has changed dramatically from one of labor intensity to one of capital intensity. This newer, vast, costly and complex world of intelligence is in need of stronger direction and management which only a leader divorced from the day to day management of the CIA can bring. As a prime example, the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence has recently noted large shortfalls in the planning and programming for collection assets necessary to monitor a potential START agreement. Given the fact that the Intelligence Community has been aware of this need and the number of different intelligence agencies who have been attempting to manipulate the end result, the lack of strong, central management direction has become all too readily apparent.

Secondly, the experiment whereby the nation's chief intelligence officer is also required to execute policy in the form of covert action simply has not worked. It may be unfair to expect the DCI to maintain the delicate balance between implementing foreign policy in the form of covert action and providing unbiased intelligence. Unless the President receives unvarnished intelligence from the DCI without the concern, expressed by Secretary of State Shultz, that it may be driven by policy considerations in the form of covert action, then the President is not being well served.

To the critics who would claim that the proposed reorganization would create a new layer of bureaucracy and would weaken the position of the DCI, I would point out that the infrastructure has been in place for years. The Director of National Intelligence would manage the intelligence agencies through the extant Intelligence Community Staff and the National Intelligence Council. In addition, the stature and authorities of the DNI would be retained through his control of the Intelligence Community budget, by virtue of the fact that he would serve as the President's principal intelligence advisor and, finally through his appointment as a statutory member of the National Security Council.

Among the important features of S. 1820 are the following:

1. Establishes the position of Director of National Intelligence (DNI) and makes him a statutory member of the NSC in his role as primary advisor on intelligence.

2. States the principal role of intelligence and the U.S. intelligence agencies.

3. Establishes that the principal role of the DNI is to serve as the nation's senior intelligence officer and primary adviser to the President on foreign intelligence matters. It relieves the DNI from any duties involving the formulation of foreign policy and the implementation of "special activities."

4. Delineates the DNI's responsibilities and authorities. (Most of these are extracted from Executive Order 12333).

5. Establishes the positions of Director and Deputy Director of the Central Intelligence Agency, requires that one or both be career intelligence officers and provides tenure to the D/CIA for a period of seven years.

6. Delineates the D/CIA's duties and authorities. (Most of these are also extracted from Executive Order 12333.) One duty is "to conduct special activities approved by the President. On this, I envision the D/CIA reporting directly to the President's National Security Advisor.

I look forward to your comments and recommendations.

Sincerely,

ARLEN SPECTER.

CLIFFORD & WARNKE,
ATTORNEYS AND COUNSELLORS AT LAW,
Washington, DC, July 19, 1988.

Hon. ARLEN SPECTER,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SPECTER: I was pleased to receive your recent letter concerning S. 1820 which I have reviewed with interest. As I said in my November 20, 1987 letter to Senator Boren and Senator Cohen, proposals such as S. 1820 to separate the functions of the nation's chief intelligence officer and the director of the CIA should receive consideration by the intelligence committees. This consideration of course must be measured and deliberate.

As you have indicated, there is every reason to attempt to improve coordination of the nation's various intelligence agencies whose activities are vital to our security and effectiveness. A principal means of such coordination must be clear delineation of responsibility and accountability. Moreover, the role of the CIA in engaging in special or covert activities, as well as intelligence activities, pursuant to Section 102(d)(5) of the National Security Act of 1947, necessarily complicates this coordination. It is essential in fulfilling the strictures of the 1947 Act and related laws, along with the constitutional principles on which they are based, to keep covert activities separate from intelligence activities, as well as restricted to their intended scope and purpose. As you know, I recently have testified in this regard before the Senate Intelligence Committee, as well as its House counterpart and the House Foreign Affairs Committee.

The bill that you have proposed, in my estimation, largely addresses the principles and concerns that I have stated. Therefore, I support the overall conception of the legislation. There are, however, some specific aspects of the bill about which I would express some concern and suggest some revision.

First, the bill should establish more clearly the relationship between the DNI and the D/CIA. As I understand it, you propose that the D/CIA be subordinate to the DNI at least in the intelligence field where the DNI would oversee and coordinate all of the intelligence agencies on an equivalent basis. Such a system seems sensible, and the bill should make it more explicit.

Second and perhaps most significantly, the bill must more carefully address the management of covert activities. This is one aspect of the relationship of the DNI and D/CIA described above, but also a broader and more important aspect of the exercise of covert activities. As I understand it, the bill would charge the D/CIA with operational responsibility for formulating and implementing covert activities, but also charge the DNI with responsibility for overseeing such activities "on a periodic basis." In addition, the DNI would serve on the National Security Council and thus be accountable directly to the President, while the D/CIA would not. I believe that it is essential to proper exercise of covert activities, pursuant to the National Security Act of 1947, that the head of the agency charged with primary responsibility for covert activities be accountable directly to the President. As you know, the President must approve all covert activities and must expect to answer for these activities to the Congress and the people. Only in this way can covert activities be controlled and contained. Any unneeded link in the chain of command over these activities threatens the system of constraint and responsibility.

Therefore, I would suggest that the bill be revised to specify that covert activities, unlike intelligence activities, are the sole responsibility of the D/CIA who is directly accountable to the President and the National Security Council—including, of course, the DNI—with regard to these activities. While such a revision entails differentiating between the D/CIA's authority over intelligence activities and covert activities, I view this differentiation as desirable. It will strengthen the intended and essential separation of these activities.

Third, the bill may require some revision with regard to the statutory obligations for reporting activities of the intelligence agencies to the Congress pursuant to the National Security Act of 1947, as amended. Having a single official like the DNI responsible for reporting all intelligence activities is sensible. Covert activities however should remain a subject for the President to report to the Congress. Additionally, the D/CIA as the offical with sole responsibility for covert activities should also be required to report to Congress.

I trust that these comments will prove to be constructive. Your effort to improve the operation of the intelligence agencies is notable, and I wish you success.

Sincerely,

CLARK M. CLIFFORD.

NATIONAL SECURITY REFORM

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, the third bill of this package is the National Security Reform Act. A more detailed statement of its purpose follows:

Hearings before the Senate Intelligence Committee and joint hearings before the Select Senate and House committees on the Iran/Contra matter have demonstrated the need for significant action in order to establish the appropriate role for congressional oversight pursuant to the checks and balances contemplated by the U.S. Constitution. Notwithstanding any action which may be taken by the President by way of Executive order on this issue, legislative change is necessary to impose statutory requirements governing this or future administrations where any such executive orders might be countermanded.

This bill is based on S. 1818 which I introduced in the 100th Congress and on which hearings were held by the Senate Intelligence Committee in late 1987.

This bill has four goals:

First, to encourage timely consultation with key Members of Congress to obtain the benefit of their insights to avoid future blunders like the transaction with Iran on arms for hostages;

Second, to provide for effective congressional oversight by specific statutory requirements establishing precise time limits for notice where the President decides not to consult in advance;

Third, to establish mandatory penalties where executive branch officials make false statements to congressional committees; and

Fourth, to add an Inspector General for the Central Intelligence Agency to help assure lawful internal compliance on matters which do not come within the purview of congressional oversight.

Notwithstanding the obvious failure of the executive branch to provide requisite information to Congress under the provisions of existing statutes, some have argued that there was compliance because of the vagaries of current law. In order to prevent a repetition of such conduct, the National Security Act of 1947 (50 U.S.C. 413) and section 662 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. 2422), known as the Hughes-Ryan amendment, are made more specific by this bill. Existing law prohibits the expenditure of funds by the Central Intelligence Agency for covert activities "unless and until the President finds that each such operation is important to the national security of the United States." Efforts have been made to justify the CIA's action in the Iran/Contra matter by contentions that an oral finding was sufficient and that a later written finding could retroactively justify earlier covert action.

This bill unequivocally requires that the findings be in writing and that the President shall give notice and a copy of any finding to the House and Senate Intelligence Committees contemporaneously with the finding, but in no event later than 24 hours after it is made. A limited exception is provided for an oral finding in situations where the President deems that immediate action by the United States is required to deal with the emergency situation affecting vital national interests and time does not permit the preparation of a written finding. In that event, the finding must be immediately reduced to writing after the action is orally approved, with the written finding to be completed no later than 24 hours after the making of the oral finding.

Where an oral finding is used, there is the additional requirement that the written finding shall include a statement of the reasons of the President for having first proceeded with an oral finding. This bill further provides that a finding shall be effective only with respect to operations beginning after the finding was made by the President in order to preclude any contention that the finding may retroactively cover prior CIA operations.

These statutory requirements leave no room for doubt that no covert action may be undertaken without complying with the requirements of a written finding and the requisite notice, by any personnel of the executive branch or anyone acting on its behalf including foreign governments or any individual. This specific provision would preclude any future argument that the delivery of arms to Iran was legally justified, after the fact, by a retroactive finding or that other entities or actors were not bound by the same limitations affecting the CIA.

This bill further removes any possible ambiguity in section 501(b) of the President's obligation to notify the House and Senate Intelligence Committees of covert action. Section 501(b) now provides:

(b) The President shall fully inform the intelligence committees in a timely fashion of intelligence operations in foreign countries, other than activities intended solely for obtaining necessary intelligence, for which prior notice was not given under subsection (a) and shall provide a statement of the reasons for not giving prior notice.

The phrase "for which prior notice was not given under subsection (a)" carries the direct implication that the House and Senate Intelligence Committees should have been "fully and currently informed" of covert activities which are covered by section 501(b). It is obvious that the President did not comply with section 501(b) to inform the Intelligence Committees in a "timely fashion" where some 14 months elapsed from the time of the first covert action on the Iranian arms sales to the time that information reached the Intelligence Committees. Yet, some have contended that the exigencies of the situation excused the President from giving earlier notice so that requirements of a "timely fashion" were observed.

This bill removes any room for such future arguments by requiring the President to give notice to the Intelligence Committees contemporaneously with any written or oral finding. In order to remove any conceivable ambiguity as to the meaning of "contemporaneously," a time certain is added requiring the information to be transmitted no later than 24 hours after the making of an oral or written finding. Absent the experience of the Iran/Contra matter, it would seem unnecessary to put a 24-hour limitation after the requirement of "contemporaneously," but the recent experience that a time certain be affixed so that no one can later claim that "contemporaneously" means days, weeks, months, or even years later.

The requirement that the President shall contemporaneously inform the Intelligence Committees is intended to provide a procedure where the Intelligence Committees might be consulted in advance so that the President would have the benefit of their thinking if he so chose. The language of section 501(a)(1) to keep the Intelligence Committees "fully and currently informed of all intelligence activities" suggests a design for congressional input. Even with such contemporaneous information and the possibility of congressional input, it would remain within the President's power to proceed or not as he chooses.

There is much to recommend the availability of the institutional experience of the Senate and House Intelligence Committees. Had there been a review by the Intelligence Committees of the sale of arms to Iran, it is likely that the policy would never have been implemented. Had members of the Senate and House Intelligence Committees joined the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Defense and others in discouraging Presidential action in selling arms to Iran, the President might well have ceased and desisted on his own. Had the President declined to terminate that disastrous policy, then the Congress might have utilized its power to terminate funding through its appropriations powers, thereby ending the sale of arms to Iran.

The President's obligations on congressional oversight are further limited by excluding notice to the Intelligence Committees where the President determines that it is essential to limit such disclosure to meet extraordinary circumstances affecting the vital interests of the United States. In that event, such notice is to be given only to the chairman and ranking minority members of the Intelligence Committees, the Speaker and minority leader of the House of Representatives and the majority and minority leaders of the Senate. That more limited disclosure gives sufficient assurances of preservation of secrecy. A valid argument could be made that notice should go only to the leadership of both Houses in the interests of secrecy, but the greater familiarity of the chairman and vice chairman of the Intelligence Committees warrants their being included.

In 1988, the full Senate considered a 48-hour notice requirement included in S. 1721, as introduced by Senator COHEN. Although the Senate passed the bill including this notice requirement on March 15, 1988, the House of Representatives did not act on the bill prior to adjournment of the 100th Congress. Therefore, I am reintroducing my bill today in an effort to press for enactment of this necessary notice requirement.

This bill further provides for a mandatory sentence of imprisonment for any officer or employee of the United States who provides false information to any committee or subcommittee of the Senate or House of Representatives. No matter how rigorous or exacting statutory requirements may be, the oversight function of Congress cannot be accomplished if executive branch officials present false or misleading testimony to the Congress.

This is especially problemsome where witnesses appear before the Intelligence Committees in a secret session. Where evidence is provided in a public session, there is an opportunity for others to learn of the false information and to come forward with the truth so that the congressional oversight committees can perform their functions. That is not possible where key executive officials appear in secret and provide false information to the Oversight Committees. Under those circumstances, the committees realistically have little or no opportunity to determine the truth.

While false official statements to such congressional committees are covered by section 1001 of the Criminal Code, (18 U.S.C. 1001), this kind of misconduct, either in secret or public session, is so serious that it warrants a mandatory jail sentence.

While there has been experience with witnesses who return to the committee to apologize for prior testimony, such apologies fall far short of correcting the enormous damage which has been done. Obviously, there is no way to know how much false, deceptive, or misleading evidence has been presented in secret where the truthful information has never come to the attention of the committees. This mandatory jail sentence is intended to put members of the executive branch on notice that the matter is extremely serious as reflected by the heavy penalty.

It is obviously well within the ambit for any witness who appears before a congressional committee to decline to answer any question until that witness has had an opportunity to reflect on the question or to consult with his or her superior. Simply stated, it is understandable if a witness declines to answer or asks for a delay, but it is intolerable for false or deceptive answers to be made. The committee would doubtless consider not insisting on an answer where some reason was advanced for nondisclosure. Where any witness chooses to decline to answer a question, there is always an opportunity for further consideration by both the witness and the committee.

In any event, an enforceable legal obligation to answer does not arise as a practical matter until citation for contempt of Congress is obtained and the court orders an answer. It is only at this point that a witness is subject to a sanction for contempt for failing to answer.

This bill further provides that anyone who gives such false or deceptive information may recant and avoid possible criminal liability by correcting the record within 5 days. This 5-day period should be ample time for rethinking the issue and time to make the appropriate correction.

I ask unanimous consent that this bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 145

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "National Security Reform Act."

SEC. 2. PRESIDENTIAL FINDINGS ON CERTAIN INTELLIGENCE OPERATIONS

Subsection (b) of section 501 of the National Security Act of 1947 is amended to read as follows:

"(b)(1) No covert operations in foreign countries, other than operations intended solely for obtaining necessary intelligence, may be approved, conducted, or funds appropriated or expended for, by or on behalf of the executive branch, unless and until the President makes a finding that each such covert operation is important to the national security of the United States. Operations by or on behalf of the executive branch include action by any officer or employee of the United States Government or any foreign government or individual acting at the request of or with the concurrence of any officer or employee of the United States Government. Each such covert operation shall be considered a significant anticipated intelligence activity for the purposes of this section.

"(2) Each finding of the President under paragraph (1)—

"(A) shall immediately be reduced to writing and signed by the President, except that the President may make such finding orally if the President determines that immediate action by the United States is required to deal with an emergency situation affecting vital United States interests and that time does not permit the drafting of a written finding;

"(B) any oral finding as provided for under (A) shall be reduced to writing immediately after the action is orally approved with the written finding to be completed no later than twenty-four hours after the making of the oral finding;

"(C) the written version of the oral finding shall include a statement of the reasons of the President for having first proceeded with an oral finding;

"(D) shall be effective only with respect to operations beginning after the finding was made by the President.

"(3) The President shall contemporaneously, but in no event later than twenty-four hours after the making of a written finding, inform the intelligence Committees of, and provide a copy of, any such finding which authorizes covert action unless the President determines it is essential to limit such notification to meet extraordinary circumstances affecting vital interests of the United States in which event oral notice shall contemporaneously, but in no event later than twenty-four hours after the making of an oral or written finding, be given to the chairman and ranking minority members of the Intelligence Committees, the Speaker and minority leader of the House of Representatives and the majority and minority leaders of the Senate.".

SEC. 3. DECEIVING CONGRESS OR ITS COMMITTEES.

Whoever being an officer or employee of the United States, in any matter within the jurisdiction of the Senate or the House of Representatives of the United States, or any committee or subcommittee thereof, knowingly and willfully falsifies, conceals, or covers up by any trick, scheme, or device a material fact, or makes any false, fictitious or fraudulent statement or misrespresentation, or makes or uses any false writing or document knowing the same to contain any false, fictitious, or fraudulent statement of entry shall be imprisoned for not less than one year nor more than five years and may be fined not more than $10,000. Liability under the provisions of this section may be avoided by anyone who notifies in writing the committee or subcommittee of the Senate or House of Representatives of the United States of any violation hereof and provides the truthful information in its place within five days.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I think there is an optimistic spirit present today. I think in the past our leaders, including you, Mr. President, in your capacity as majority leader, Senator DOLE as the Republican leader, have accomplished much.

Now we have a new administration, a new breeze which is blowing through the city, through the country, and through the world. We have new leadership on the majority side. And there have been eloquent statements today about the prospects for a great productive 101st Congress. I look forward to working with my colleagues on these important tasks.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

I thank the Chair.

CONGRATULATIONS TO THE MAJORITY LEADER

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I rise today to congratulate the majority leader for his courage, for his wisdom, and for his eloquent remarks which truly serve as a Magna Carta for the coming years here in the Senate under his leadership.

I was particularly struck and pleased by his emphasis on bipartisanship leading to nonpartisanship as we approach and face the various problems in the international field.

In this connection, there are a variety of bills that have been introduced or will be introduced in the area of controlling chemical weapons.

I hope these different bills on both sides of the aisle and by different individual Senators can be blended or welded together to give us a bipartisan bill upon which we can all agree.

I was also struck by the majority leader's emphasis on international environmental concerns, because of what value is it if a nation takes action by itself to protect its environment, only to be swamped by environmental fallout—acid rain, whatever it may be—from a neighboring nation?

I would hope that the consideration of these problems would lead to greater support for the U.N. Environmental Program at Nairobi, and for the partial abdication of sovereignty that nations will have to agree to as they move to protect the international environment.

I yield the floor.

PRESERVATION OF THE RAIN FORESTS

Mr. REID. Mr. President, every time a person is killed, of course a life is lost, but also goals and hopes are left unfulfilled.

In Brazil last month, a life was destroyed. Chico Mendes, a union organizer and world-renowned environmentalist, was murdered by people who opposed his efforts to protect the Amazon rain forests.

These craven people are ranchers who burn the forests so their cattle can graze. They succeeded in destroying a life. But they cannot destroy what a person stands for and what he believes—you cannot murder an idea.

Chico Mendes leaves behind his widow, but he leaves much more than his wife. The death of Mendes sparked the birth of a new impetus to preserve the rain forests—to ensure that the goals and hopes of Chico Mendes are not forgotten.

Although Mendes' death was the most publicized, he is only 1 of an estimated 700 killed since 1985 in land disputes involving the rain forests—almost 20 human beings each month.

The Catholic-run Pastoral Land Commission in Brazil estimates that the cattle ranchers' union, to which Mendes' accused murderers belong, was alone responsible for 73 murders in the last past year—more than one murder every week.

Mr. Mendes fought against the destruction of rain forests in the political and legal arena, and fought literally in the paths of bulldozers. He was also a senior environmental consultant for the World Bank, and a recipient of the 1987 U.N. Global 500 Award given to the 500 people throughout the world who did the most to protect our environment. One of his finest achievements was the pioneering of the "extractive reserves," a practice which works upon the premise that we can reap the benefits of the rain forest more profitably by leaving it standing than by burning it to the ground.

Mr. Mendes had an impressive knowledge and understanding of the rain forests. He knew the dangers of their unimpeded, unrestricted, uncontrolled destruction.

The legacy left by Mendes is a critical one for us to carry, for we are now at a frightening juncture in the history of our world. Rain forests are being destroyed at an estimated rate of 54 acres per minute. I repeat, Mr. President: 54 acres per minute, 24 hours a day, 7 days a week, 12 months a year. This ravaging takes no holidays. That is 28 million acres per year. At this rate, the remaining tropical rain forests will be gone entirely in less than 100 years.

The decimation of the rain forests is happening everywhere. Next to Brazil, Indonesia has the largest expanse of rain forests in the world, and its rain forests are being leveled at a rate of 1 million acres each year.

In the Amazon basin in 1987, scientists estimate that fires kindled to clear land for farming and cattle ranching covered 77,000 square miles—an area the size of South Dakota.

These fires and the subsequent deforestation contribute radically to the greenhouse effect. An estimated 10 percent of the carbon dioxide in the Earth's atmosphere is now being attributed directly to burning in the Brazilian Amazon. The increasing amount of carbon dioxide helps create what is effectively a heat trap in our environment. As a result, the Earth's temperature is consistently and ominously rising. Some scientists say that the greenhouse effect generated by deforestation played a contributing role in the 1988 drought that swept the American Midwest.

What is happening to the rain forests is not merely a domestic problem for Brazil. We hear veiled threats from the Brazilian Government that if the United States and other nations impose punitive measures against Brazil, they will not occupy the rain forest in what they call a "rational manner." In addition, the ranchers' union called a press conference to deny involvement in the Mendes murder and denounced "foreign imperialists" for interfering in Brazilian affairs.

This is not a Brazilian affair, Mr. President. This is a world affair. We all stand to lose—and lose big—if something is not done to halt the accelerating destruction of the world's rain forests.

I urge my colleagues to join me in continuing efforts to link credit proposals with environmental protection packages. Brazil is the Third World's leading debtor nation, with $115 billion in foreign debt. With a domestic economy tottering on the brink of collapse, Brazil is in a precarious position. We can help them, but we must extract a commitment that they will do their share by taking steps to protect the remaining rain forests.

But there comes a time, Mr. President, when we cannot wait longer for commitments and promises. This is that time. I therefore plan to introduce legislative measures—I will join my colleagues in measures—that will send Brazil a message: the world will not stand and watch the fires rage unabated. We want constructive policies and action, not technical studies and talk of "rational exploitation." Because each day we wait for such studies to be completed, Mr. President, we lose an area of the rain forest the size of Philadelphia. This loss is permanent. This is unthinkable.

(At this point Mr. BREAUX assumed the chair.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. BURNS. Thank you, Mr. President; I appreciate that very much. I will be very brief because I know there is some more business to come before the floor.

I rise today to introduce legislation to designate November 9, 1989, as Montana Centennial Day.

This is a special day for me and, as I look forward to working with this distinguished body of men and women who have dedicated their lives and their talent and their well-being to this great Nation.

As this is a special day for me, 1989 is a special day for my home State of Montana. One hundred years ago, Montana was admitted to the Union. It is the 41st State admitted, November 8, 1889, by President Harrison.

The Montana State delegate met, produced a constitution, and approved it by a popular vote of 24,000 to 2,274, on October 1, 1889. The State was first known as the Treasure State, alluding to the deposits of gold and silver and other precious metals. But the real treasures were discovered a few years later when the great herds of cattle and sheep moved northward to Colorado, Oklahoma, and Texas to a sea of grass and fresh water. Still known as a Treasure State, it has now become more familiar as the Big Sky Country. It is the fourth largest State after Alaska, Texas, and California, encompassing 146,000 square miles. Roughly 800,000 people call Montana home, miners and loggers and farmers and ranchers, educators and those involved in tourism. Life in Montana represents a personal freedom. The free spirit of the cowboy still lives in spectacular scenery. From the eastern prairies to the rugged beauty of the Rockies to the west, Montana truly is the land of the "Big Sky."

I would urge all Senators to join me in cosponsoring Montana Centennial Day, November 8, 1989. Thank you, Mr. President.

MONTANA CENTENNIAL DAY

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I would like to thank the new Senator from Montana and welcome him to the Senate and the 101st Congress. I would also like to wish him a happy birthday today.

Mr. President, 1989 marks the 100th year of statehood for Montana and designating November 8—the day the territorial Governor received a telegram confirming President Harrison's proclamation creating Montana as the 41st State and Joseph K. Toole became its first Governor—is fitting—as Montana Centennial Day is only fitting considering the colorful history and the rich contributions Montana has given to the rest of the Nation—from its people to its wealth of natural resources.

Montana, "Big Sky Country." As Montana historian K. Ross Toole referred to home, "Montana: High, Wide and Handsome."

French trappers may have visited the Montana area as early as the 1740's. The United States obtained most of what is now Montana as part of the Louisiana Purchase in 1803. The northwest part was gained by treaty with Great Britain in 1846. At various times, parts of Montana were in the territories of Louisiana, Missouri, Nebraska, Dakota, Oregon, Washington and Idaho.

In 1841, Jesuit missionaries established St. Mary Mission, the first attempt at a permanent settlement, near what is now Stevensville. In 1847, the American Fur Co. built Fort Benton on the Missouri River. The town that developed there is Montana's oldest. Montana is a land of immigrants from Europe and the Orient and a land where native Americans are a proud part of our heritage.

It is a land of great people—pioneering, enduring people with a sense of optimism and community, people who helped define the American character, people such as Mike Mansfield and Jeanette Rankin, copper kings W.A. Clark and Marcus Daly, Chief Joseph, and artist Charlie Russell.

Montana, though sparsely populated, represents a great portion of the resource base of our country—metals and minerals, oil, timber, water and power.

This is a land where the Plains meet the Rockies. It's a land of sturdy people, a part of America's past and part of her future.

Montana is a land of extreme beauty and extreme hardship, a land of hope and a land of tragedy, from the bitter winters of the Northern Plains to the strange, unearthly beauty of Yellowstone National Park; from the cradle of women's suffrage to Custer's blunder at the Little Big Horn.

Mr. President, this resolution is only the kickoff of what will be a yearlong celebration of events such as a centennial celebration on the mall, Montana art and film festivals, and the Centennial Minute, a weekly speech on Montana history that I will give here on the Senate floor.

Mr. President, there is a long history of commemorative coins being issued for the centennial of the States of Alabama, Arkansas, Illinois, Iowa, Maine, Missouri, Texas, the centennial of the Wisconsin territory, the 75th anniversary of California, and the 150th anniversary of Vermont.

However, not a single commemorative honors a city or State in the intermountain West. That is why I will introduce in just a few days legislation that will call for the U.S. Mint to strike a $5 commemorative coin in recognition of the centennials of Montana, Idaho, North and South Dakota, Washington, and Wyoming.

The Northwest centennial commemorative coin thus would be an important reminder and recognition of the youth of our Nation, of its western heritage and of its continued vitality.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to support this joint resolution and invite them to come to Montana and join us as we celebrate our 100th birthday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEAHY). The Senator from Illinois.

TREASURY TAX OPTION MAKES NO SENSE

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, we have had two trial balloons relating to the thrift crisis this month. Earlier in the month, there was a proposal to cut the insured deposit amount from $100,000 to $50,000. Today we are faced with a proposal to finance the recapitalization of the thrift insurance fund by taxing depositors at banks and S&L's at a rate of perhaps 30 cents for every $100 deposits.

Resolving the thrift crisis must receive the top priority of this committee, and the entire Senate. Indeed, I believe it is the No. 1 domestic issue facing this Congress. I want to work in a bipartisan manner with the administration on this issue; it is the only way to solve the savings and loan problem. Having said that, however, I also have to say that there must be some folks at the other end of the avenue that do not deem to share my interest in working out a bipartisan approach. Instead, they seem to be pursuing a comic relief approach.

I hope these proposals are intended as comic relief; I find it hard to believe that there is anyone downtown that would make proposals like these seriously.

Today's paper describes this latest tax proposal as getting a "Bronx cheer" reception in Congress. Frankly, I think that severely understates my view of its merits. This option would not even make a good joke on the David Letterman Show.

There is no question that we are going to need a lot of money to solve this problem. The way to raise that money, however, is not to create further disincentives for savers. We already have a savings rate that is so low that it is undermining our economic competitiveness.

What someone down at Treasury is talking about is equivalent to taxing hostages in order to pay off the kidnapers. Depositors did not cause the thrift problem; they are innocent victims.

Treasury's proposed option poses real risks. Instead of providing the money we need for the FSLIC fund, such a tax may well drive savers out of our depository institutions, banks, savings and loans, and credit unions, and into alternate investments such as Government bonds and mutual funds. The net result, therefore, could be to further undermine our depository institutions during this time of stress. That cannot be Treasury's purpose.

Further, it is worth remembering that the thrifts are already paying very substantial insurance premiums, and that it is likely that the FDIC premium will also rise to provide additional protection to the bank insurance fund. With that in mind, I do not see how it can possibly make sense to try to effectively increase the premiums yet again. It cannot work; it will not work. It will simply destroy the competitive position of our Nation's depository institutions. It will not solve the thrift problem. This proposal, if adopted, would likely make the problem worse, further undermining the health of thrifts, and spreading the problem to our banks and credit unions.

I hope I have made it clear what I think of this proposal, Mr. President. As a member of the Senate Banking Committee, I intend to do everything I can to see that this idea gets the early burial it deserves. I hope the Banking Committee and the full Senate will send Treasury an unmistakable message that this tax plan should be dropped—now.

CALLING FOR CABINET-LEVEL "DRUG CZAR"

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, on another subject, I am very concerned about what appears to be the desire of President Bush not to include William Bennett, the new drug czar, in his Cabinet.

I am, therefore, pursuing legislative action to put the position of "drug czar" in the White House Cabinet.

The President is making a serious mistake.

In his inaugural address, speaking to the drug problem, President Bush pledged, "This scourge will stop." The President spoke of the massive problem of drug abuse in this country and of the high priority it would have in his administration. Now the President needs to back up his words with action.

By not making the drug czar a Cabinet position, the President is undercutting his inaugural commitment to turn the tide in the war on drugs. The first step in stopping this scourge should be to give the drug czar the full recognition and power of a top Cabinet member.

For William Bennett to be most effective, he needs to be included in all Cabinet meetings and all Cabinet decisions. President Bush should correct this situation by immediately including William Bennett as a Cabinet member.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia.

(The remarks of Mr. ROCKEFELLER pertaining to the introduction of legislation are located in today's RECORD under "Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.")

STATEMENT ON THE DISTINGUISHED MAJORITY LEADER

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I wish to compliment the distinguished majority leader on his very eloquent and forward-looking and positive statement which he made at the beginning of the session today. I think he has clearly outlined what appears to me to be a wise approach in dealing with our Nation's manifold problems. I know that he will receive the support of Members on both sides of the aisle as he attempts to work in a bipartisan manner with the new President of the United States.

Let me also say that I think our new President got off on the right foot and set the right tone in his inaugural speech. He has indicated not only his willingness but also his desire to work with Congress. Mr. President, this is a sweet and soft breeze that comes from the direction of the White House at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue. We have had entirely too much confrontation over these past 8 years, not enough cooperation and working together. The new President is a creature of the Congress; he served in the House of Representatives, and he has had many important positions in the executive branch. So he comes to the job very well equipped and with a sense and an understanding as to how the constitutional system works and certainly with the knowledge that the legislative branch is equal to—not above, not below—the executive branch.

I look forward with considerable optimism to the future, believing that Mr. Bush will indeed work with the Congress. I know that our leadership on both sides of the aisle has extended the hand of cooperation in return, and it is in that way that the American people will profit from the services of their elected officials.

JOHN GONELLA

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, on December 23, 1988, John Gonella, a former member of my staff, died. A man of great breadth and talent, John served as my assistant from 1971 until 1975.

Born in Dollar, Scotland, John Gonella was educated at Dollar Academy, west of Scotland College, and Glasgow University where he graduated with degrees in economics and political science. In 1939 he joined the British Army rising to the rank of lieutenant colonel. During World War II, he volunteered for the British Commandos and served with the 5th Gurkha Rifles and Gurkha Commandos in Africa, Burma, India, Pakistan, Afghanistan, and China. In 1948, he emigrated to the United States and upon adopting U.S. citizenship in 1955, relinquished his service commission.

John Gonella enjoyed a rich and remarkable career serving as a soldier, diplomat, public relations specialist, businessman, civil servant, writer, journalist, and broadcaster. His service in our Government began in 1965 when he served as a Foreign Service officer with the Department of State. In 1966, he was appointed to the White House congressional liaison staff by President Lyndon B. Johnson and assigned duties with the House of Representatives. Before coming to the Senate, he was a consultant for Congressional and Legislative Affairs to the National Cable Television Association. He served as executive assistant to Senator Harrison Williams from New Jersey prior to leaving the Hill in 1977, whereupon he became assistant to the vice president of the Association of American Railroads.

In addition to his regular employment, John Gonella pursued many other interests at various times. He was an avid golf enthusiast and wrote a golf column for the Washington Post during a 5-year period. He served as moderator of the National Council of Churches weekly radio program "Men of Faith;" had his own show "Fore on Four" on WRC-NBC television; served as moderator of Department of State seminars on world affairs; was radio interviewer in the theatre, arts, literature and music fields for the American Radio Guild; lectured in poetry for the District of Columbia Public Libraries; and coordinated visits of foreign dignitaries for the District of Columbia Government and the Department of State. His words were his tools. He spoke and wrote with the precision and artistry of a gifted sculptor.

John Gonella was a very able staff assistant who can best be characterized by his civility and self-effacement. He was truly a gentlemen. He celebrated life to the fullest and enjoyed the rewards that come from having friends. He taught his sons well to place a high premium on friendship, which is a legacy for which they can be proud.

I extend my sympathies to his widow, Ashton, and his two sons, John and Geoffrey, two step-sons, Ashton and David, and five step-grandchildren.

Mr. President, Tennyson said, "I am a part of all that I have met." I believe that. John Gonella will always be a part of me and of those on this Capitol Hill who knew him and had the opportunity to work with him.

Let Fate do her worst, there are relics of joy,
Bright dreams of the past, which she cannot destory;
Which come, in the night-time of sorrow and care,
And bring back the features that joy used to wear.
Long, long be my heart with such memories filled!
Like the vase in which roses have once been distilled,—
You may break, you may shatter the vase, if you will,
But the scent of the roses will hang round it still.

Mr. President, there is a poem titled "Scotland Afar," by Campbell Gillion. I now read it to John's wife, Ashton, and to others in his family.

Afar, O fair Scotland, we hear you pipes calling!
Afar, the Old Country your beauty beguiles!
The mist on your mountains, when evening is falling
Envelopes my heart-land across the long miles.

Afar in some desert, remote on some island,
Away in some city pursuing dull schemes,
There's hope for the soul whose heart is still highland,
Who glimpses the loch and the moor in his dreams.

O where are you highlands, you uplifting mountain,
That rescues the spirit like Scotland the brave;
Those streams that refresh like a soul-quenching fountain
And save us from being a fool or a knave?

Scotland Afar! Your sons' and your daughters'
Descendants remember the rock whence they came
And tugs at the heart across the vast waters,
The ancestral home and old Scottish name.

Mr. HELMS addressed the Chair.

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Senator from Kentucky. I will be brief.

Controlling the spread of AIDS;

Directing the Federal Communications Commission to proscribe all obscene and indecent material transmitted by means of intrastate telephone communications by amending section 223 of the Communications Act of 1934;

Protecting the lives of unborn human beings;

Restoring the right of voluntary prayer in public schools and to promote the separation of powers; and

Amending the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 to prohibit the use of compulsory union dues for political purposes.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I send five bills to the desk. In the interest of time I ask the clerk to, in tandem, give them first reading, and then I shall ask for second reading. And the distinguished majority leader will object, as he knows. But I send five bills to the desk, and ask that they be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the bills separately for the information of the Senate.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill to control the spread of AIDS;

A bill to direct the Federal Communications Commission to proscribe all obscene and indecent material transmitted by means of intrastate telephone communications by amending section 223 of the Communications Act of 1934;

A bill to protect the lives of unborn human beings;

A bill to restore the right of voluntary prayer in public schools and to promote the separation of powers;

A bill to amend the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 to prohibit the use of compulsory union dues for political purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the second reading of the bills?

Mr. MITCHELL. I object, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the majority leader object en bloc?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection having been made, the second reading of the bills will go over 1 legislative day pursuant to rule XIV, paragraph 4.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Presiding Officer.

I thank the distinguished Senator from Kentucky for yielding.

Mr. McCONNELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The junior Senator from Kentucky is recognized.

Mr. McCONNELL. I thank the Chair.

CAMPAIGN FINANCE REFORM IN THE 101ST CONGRESS

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, I rise today in strong support of the Dole-McConnell-Stevens Campaign Finance Reform Act of 1989. Before discussing what this bill contains, and what additional measures are needed, I would like to speak briefly on the prospects for campaign finance reform in the 101st Congress.

Mr. President, today the distinguished Republican leader introduced a bill on the subject of campaign finance reform. This will be known in this session as the Dole-McConnell-Stevens bill. And it represents the kind of package that a clear majority on this side of the aisle feel would be in the best interest of this institution and of the country.

Before briefly discussing the contents of that bill, let me just make some observations about campaign finance in the 101st Congress. I did notice with interest that the distinguished majority leader raised this issue as well. So it clearly enjoys a priority on both sides of the aisle. I hope we will be able to enact something. Senator Chiles and Senator Stafford, who recently retired from this body, made a recommendation on the way out the door on this subject.

Let me start by reading from an article which appeared recently in the Washington Post: The article is entitled "Two Ex-Senators Recommend Tighter Fund-Raising Laws." In it, Democratic Senator Lawton Chiles and Republican Senator Bob Stafford present their shared views on what needs to be done about our campaign finance system.

Both Chiles and Stafford say: "Everyone understands there is a problem with campaign financing"—and although they "do not expect Congress to approve major changes," they believe "modest changes are possible," including: Stronger restrictions on political action committees, prohibiting bundling by PAC's, clamping down on "soft money," countering independent expenditures, and prohibiting PAC's from paying off campaign debts.

Mr. President, these certainly would be needed changes in our campaign finance system. And we could probably agree to them in principle, on a bipartisan basis, and pass through this body quickly. However, we will get nowhere this year if we try to rewrite the rules of the game to benefit one party or the other.

Obviously as we have said on this side of the aisle frequently, taxpayer financing and spending limits are something that we just simply do not find acceptable. Republicans declared their solid opposition to those two items last year and we conceive of no situation under which those kinds of measures would pass. The spending limits would bootstrap the power of labor-soft money which is totally unlimited and undisclosed. So we went around and around, and spent a lot of time on that issue last year. We actually ended up passing nothing except for one bill which I offered, a bill prohibiting candidates from recovering personal funds they put into a campaign from contributions they raised after an election.

This needed reform passed the Senate by unanimous vote as an amendment to the Ethics in Post-Employment Act. Unfortunately, it did not make it out of the conference. But it is a part of the package the distinguished Republican leader introduced early today. I hope it is something we can agree on as this issue unfolds in the coming weeks.

However, I can assure my friends on the other side of the aisle that our position on taxpayer financing and spending limits has not changed one bit. As our new President would say: "read my lips—no spending limits—not now, not ever." And I might add that the eight cloture votes we endured in the last Congress have only hardened our resolve.

With regard to limited spending, I think it is appropriate now that the Presidential race is over to take a look at what happened in the one race in America where we do have spending limits.

Between the last two Presidential elections we have seen spending increase over 55 percent. Between the last two congressional elections, where there are no spending limits, spending increased only 3 percent. One reason why spending has gone up so much in Presidential contests is that you have to spend more for lawyers to help you get around the limits. One out of four dollars goes to lawyers and accountants.

Mr. President, this system has turned every major candidate into a cheater and forced most of the money spent in Presidential races into undisclosed, unlimited, unaccountable channels. In sum, spending limits have been a disaster, and we cannot accept spreading that disaster to 535 congressional races.

So I say to my friends that if we really want to achieve some meaningful campaign finance reforms, we need to leave these half-baked "reforms" aside, and extend the hand across the aisle to develop a truly bipartisan bill.

We need to, however, focus on what can be done, what would improve the system, and what would not benefit one side or the other.

The legislation that Senator DOLE and I are introducing with 10 other cosponsors is an important step in that direction. This bill would: Cut the PAC contribution limit down to $1,000 per candidate per election from $5,000 per candidate per election, raise the individual limit to $2,000, require full disclosure of "soft money," put controls on independent expenditures, prohibit bundling, and strengthen the broadcast discount bill that I introduced last year and on which Senator

INOUYE from Hawaii gave a hearing in the Commerce Committee; an outstanding morning listening to advice on that measure.

That measure, I think, will pass this body either as part of a package or as a freestanding measure, and it will save campaigns on both sides of the aisle millions of dollars by making certain that we receive the kind of broadcast discount rate that we really ought to be getting.

In addition, we can do something about the "millionaire's loophole." We discussed this frequently over the last Congress. It is part of the package that the Republican leader introduced today. It would attempt to get a handle on it by requiring notification to the other candidates, if your are going to spend a huge amount of your own money on a race, and also prohibit a candidate from paying himself back after an election.

I also will be introducing separate legislation next week to abolish political action committees altogether, and constrict the "millionaire's loophole." As I said earlier, this provision passed the Senate last year by unanimous consent. We ought to get it through Congress this year.

I think we all agree that soft money ought to be fully reported and disclosed. That is something I think could be a part of any bipartisan campaign finance reform bill.

We also should require full disclosure of "soft money" by parties, corporations, nonprofits, and unions. We should strengthen the broadcast discount law by giving candidates nonpreemptible time at the lowest unit charge for preemptible time. The cost of broadcast time accounts for 50 to 75 percent of total spending in competitive statewide races. Yet revenues from political advertising account for only three-fourths of 1 percent of broadcasters' total income. I introduced this broadcast discount measure last year and it received a very favorable hearing in the Senate Communications Subcommittee. There is no reason why this provision also shouldn't become law this year.

I believe these measures add up to real reform of our campaign finance system—and we could achieve most of them on a bipartisan basis and pass them by an overwhelming margin. But to do that, we're going to have to give up the temptation to try to skew the system to benefit one side or the other. That is the first and most important challenge confronting us as we deal with the campaign finance issue this year.

In short, there are a number of things that we agree on, ought to agree on, and that will improve the system.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished Senator from Alaska, Mr. STEVENS, is recognized.

Mr. STEVENS. I thank the Presiding Officer.

This is the first opportunity I have had to speak in the Senate with my good friend as the Presiding Officer. I welcome him to the position as President pro tempore and also congratulate him for the changes that were made here in the Senate as we were recessed. The new curtains, the new flag of the Senate and the new changes that are made here on the floor, and in the places for our staff to observe the proceedings here, are all part of the bicentennial celebration of the Congress and I think it improved the appearances here a great deal. I thank my good friend from West Virginia.

THE INAUGURATION

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I rise today to briefly comment upon the Presidential inaugural activity.

Five days ago as the world watched our Nation celebrated the peaceful transition of power from one elected President to another.

The swearing in of a new President was in fact the 200th anniversary of the Presidential swearing in ceremony itself. The inaugural ceremony and all that surrounds it was a significant symbol of what can be accomplished by a Nation of free peoples. The ceremony is important not only to this Nation and our history but for the message that it sends to the rest of the world.

Mr. President, I have risen today to commend and personally thank my good friend, the senior Senator from Kentucky, WENDELL FORD, chairman of the Joint Congressional Committee of the Inaugural Ceremonies, for his efforts and for his graciousness.

The success of the Presidential swearing in ceremony was just another example of the fine leadership that Senator FORD is providing, as chairman of the Rules Committee.

As I said, I personally compliment him because of his generosity and thoughtful courtesies that he extended to me and to members of my staff.

The bipartisan manner in which he and our staff carried out the inaugural activities resulted in presenting to the world, I think, one of the finest examples of congressional cooperation. As the Senate knows he yielded to me in order that I might present the Vice President and the President for the taking of their oath.

The Executive Director of the 1989 Joint Congressional Committee for the inaugural ceremonies was Mike Ruehling. It was his duty to see to it that the ceremony was a well-planned and skillfully-executed event which I think everyone will agree he did with flying colors. He had considerable help from a number of people including Lisa Dodge and Stephen Gray who did outstanding work in the committee office. Gail Martin and Carole Blessington of the Rules Committee staff assured that we have an enjoyable lunch following the inaugural. Two minority staff members of the Rules Committee, Wayne Schley and Bethany Erwin worked with me and spent untold hours assisting, in every conceivable way and tended to the Republican Members' needs to the greatest extent possible.

Mr. President, I think the recent ceremonies were a tremendous success. The legislative branch of our Federal Government showed the world we are indeed a united people.

I congratulate again my good friend from Kentucky, Senator WENDELL FORD, and all these find staff members for making the 1989 Presidential swearing in ceremonies so successful and for all they accomplished in this symbolic changing of the guard.

Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania wishes me to yield to him for a unanimous-consent request if that is in order at this time. I yield to my good friend for a unanimous consent request, and I yield the floor.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Alaska for yielding.

May I just say that the Senator from Alaska discharged his responsibilities in the course of the inaugural in exemplary fashion. We are all proud of what the Senator and Chairman FORD did.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT REQUEST

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that four bills I am introducing today, the one having to do with the indexing of basis on capital gains; another having to do with child care, the Child Partnership Act; third, another bill entitled Foreign Agents Registration Act; and fourth, a bill to prevent the continuation of the practice of counting Social Security surpluses as if they were deficit reduction be introduced, the statements that I have prepared be inserted in the RECORD as if given at the appropriate place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered. The several requests will be granted.

Mr. HEINZ. I thank the Senator from Alaska for yielding to me.

THE INAUGURAL ADDRESS

Mr. STEVENS. I made inquiry as to whether the inaugural address of the President has been placed in the RECORD as yet. If it has not been placed in the RECORD I ask unanimous consent it be printed in the RECORD following my remarks as a Republican member of the Joint Committee on the Inaugural. I am checking this fact now.

I withdraw the request because the minority leader wishes to have the whole program put in. I thought it had been put in on Friday. I will check it again.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois, Mr. SIMON.

Mr. SIMON. Thank you, Mr. President. I join those who say it is good to have you presiding, Mr. President. I have a feeling we have a Presiding Officer who knows the rules when Senator BYRD is presiding.

CONGRESSIONAL SALARY ACCOUNTABILITY

Mr. PRESSLER. I send a joint resolution to the desk and ask for its first reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will read the joint resolution the first time.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to read the joint resolution.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be considered read, and I now ask for its second reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the second reading of the resolution?

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection having been heard, the second reading of the joint resolution will go over for 1 day under rule XIV, paragraph 4.

Mr. PRESSLER. If this is the proper time, in holding the floor, I wish to explain what this measure is. It has a long list of bipartisan cosponsors. It is a three-part bill that includes a resolution of disapproval, a provision to ensure the House will have a chance to vote to rescind the pay raise, and a provision which permanently does away with these automatic pay raises. The key issue is whether or not Congress votes on its pay raises, and this is the only legislative vehicle that would put the pressure on the House to vote—that is, if it is passed in the Senate. And I hope it will be. There are a large number of bipartisan cosponsors. This resolution has been very carefully crafted to address the issue of a vote in both the Senate and the House and to address the issue of future votes.

I want to commend Senator GRASSLEY, in particular, for his work in working on this matter with me and others. The rest of the bipartisan list of cosponsors includes Senators REID, HELMS, MCCAIN, DECONCINI, SIMON, HUMPHREY, BOREN, BURDICK, THURMOND, HEFLIN, KASTEN, KASSEBAUM, HARKIN, BOND, BRYAN, DOMENICI, COATS, BOSCHWITZ, LEVIN, SHELBY, NICKLES, and DASCHLE.

The point is that we are seeking a situation where both Houses of Congress will vote. In my time in the House and the Senate, I have a long record of working for this. In fact, when I was in the House, I brought a lawsuit to require that the House vote, and it went to the court of appeals and the Supreme Court. It is my strongest feeling that the American people want both Houses of Congress to vote on this pay raise. This particular joint resolution I am attempting to have considered under rule XIV. Hopefully, the Senate will use this as its vehicle. I am also introducing it as the measure that could go to Governmental Affairs Committee and come through that route, if the leadership prefers it. But the point of the matter is that a growing number of the American people want Congress to vote on this raise. There are times when a pay raise may be appropriate. I happen to believe that now is not one of them. Whether this is the proper time or not is a point for debate. But it places Congress in a very bad position, not to vote. If this resolution were to pass, it would be a resolution of disapproval, but it would go to the House desk, where a discharge petition could bring it forth for a vote in the House of Representatives. Also, this particular resolution provides that future pay raises must be voted on.

I know, Mr. President, that the automatic procedure initiated by the quadrennial commission has existed for a long time, but I think it raises the public's ire toward Congress to have news stories going out that this raise is going forward in an automatic fashion.

I also know that there is much room for debate on that, but I believe that this business of delegating to commissions and then not having to act on it is something that justifiably irritates the American public very much.

This piece of legislation was carefully crafted on a bipartisan basis among many Members on both sides of the aisle. There were many other ideas. Some said that a pay raise should not go into effect until the next Congress; for instance, Senators have a 6-year term, and that would not apply in the same way as in the House.

There were other ideas put forward. Finally, it was distilled out to these three points. Most of those participating in the talks and negotiations on this matter believe it is a good resolution of disapproval. I hope that the leadership will take this as their vehicle for the resolution of disapproval. I look forward to working with the leadership on both sides of the aisle. I thank the broad range of cosponsors who have added their names to this piece of legislation.

Mr. President, today I am introducing a resolution to block the President's pay raise recommendations for the executive, legislative, and judicial branches and to prevent future back-door congressional pay hikes. I commend Senator GRASSLEY for his assistance in developing this proposal.

The Congressional Salary Accountability Act contains three important provisions. Specifically it would:

Disapprove the President's pay raise recommendations for the executive legislative, and judicial branches;

Upon enactment of the resolution, executive and legislative salaries would revert back to the January 1, 1989 rate of pay; and

Would require a recorded vote on future congressional pay raises.

There are many reasons why the pay raise should be defeated. It is very obvious that this is the wrong time for a pay increase because of the present budget deficit. It is unfair to fill our pocket books while we ask others to make sacrifices. Some argue that we are losing good people in public service because of the level of pay. I do not buy that. There is no shortage of competent people who want to work for the Government. For example, the new administration already has been overwhelmed with résumés.

The real issue here is the procedure being used to give back-door pay raises to Members of Congress. The deceptive approach of using a Presidential commission to do Congress' dirty work fails to hold the peoples' representatives accountable. The American people deserve a forthright, candid, up-or-down vote on congressional pay raises. That's what we are fighting for.

As our colleagues are aware, the proposed salary increases become effective unless the House and the Senate pass a joint resolution to disapprove them by February 7. The resolution I am introducing today would block the pay raises and require a vote on future congressional pay increases.

We are aware from past mistakes that a simple resolution of disapproval has little chance for success. While the Senate may pass a disapproval resolution before the 30-day deadline expires, we have no guarantee that the House will. Many already believe, with justifiable skepticism, that the pay raises will go through. We hope not, but Congress' track record is not encouraging. We seem always to be able to vote against raising our own pay, but somehow Congress always manages to miss the deadline by 1 day.

But our legislation will hold Congress' feet to the fire beyond the magical February 7 deadline. It will take away this plump raise even after February 7. So this time, even a vote after the deadline date will have teeth; in contrast to the meaningless sham conducted by the House of Representatives last time Congress sneaked through a pay raise.

This resolution goes beyond disapproving the pay raises. It contains three important provisions. The rescission provision is the key component and will keep this issue alive well after February 7, 1989. But, let me make it clear, our first priority is to block the raise before it goes into effect. The purpose of the rescission provision is to prevent the type of meaningless vote we saw 2 years ago. Upon enactment of this resolution, executive and legislative salaries would revert back to the January 1, 1989, rate of pay.

If the House fails to reject these raises before the deadline, we have all year to get this resolution passed in the House. The purpose of this resolution is to keep this issue on the front burner and force the House to vote on this resolution. And yes, if we do not get a vote before the deadline, judges will keep theirs, as required by the Constitution. But then again perhaps that is fitting. They are not a party to this back-door insult to the American taxpayers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Thank you Mr. President.

Just a few minutes ago my colleague from South Dakota, Senator PRESSLER, spoke about one of the bills he introduced to disapprove the pay raise. I commend my colleague from South Dakota for his leadership on this issue, and I am proud to join him in bringing this legislation to the Senate.

The substance of this resolution is something in which I have often been involved. Over the years I have sponsored or cosponsored many bills or amendments to reject the pay raise but more importantly more attention I have given to reforming the process by which the raise is approved. In fact, it is sometimes a challenge to come up with new ways to present our case, but good policy does not require fancy words or elaborate debate because it stands on its own merit.

The three components as reviewed for us by the Senator from South Dakota would give Congress full opportunity to accept responsibility, resume sensibility and to restore accountability.

First, we reject the pending salary raise. This would not stop the pay increase unless, of course, the House of Representatives acts by midnight on February 7. It does, however, put this body unequivocally in the position of opposition to that pay raise, and that is something we ought to do.

Second, we give Congress an extended period of time in which to act on the pay raise. Unfortunately, in view of the hard line in favor of the pay raise by the House leadership, it is practically impossible given only 7 working days to reject the pay raise within the statutory 30-day time period. We can, and I trust we will, restore public confidence by eventually turning back that pay raise as provided in section 2 of this bill just introduced today.

We could probably adopt a motto for the 30-day period which allows us just to sit and wait for the pay raise, and that motto would be, "There is no time like the present for postponing what you do not want to do."

That is why the third section of this resolution is so critical. In order to avoid such shenanigans again in the future years, a rollcall vote will be required before any pay raise could go into effect.

And, Mr. President, the public does agree with us. Polls by the Washington Post, the Wall Street Journal, and NBC News indicate that most of the American public opposes this pay raise. During the 100th Congress, I received over 4,000 calls and letters from Iowans objecting to the pay raise. This year since November election I have heard from over 1,000 Iowans who oppose the pay raise and more importantly the way that Congress sneaks it in.

It is our intention to build on this massive opposition among constituents to force the House of Representatives to face up to its responsibilities.

Before I conclude, I must briefly discuss the drain this salary grab has on the budget. The $128 million in direct outlays to fund the raise, according to OMB, would come out of existing appropriations.

However, if there is an extra $128 million in the budget, it should go to offset the deficit for this year and, if it is not extra, then money for the raise obviously is going to come from programs and services for the American people.

This $235 million only included in the fiscal year 1989 expense for the salary increase alone. Increased pension benefits are going to result and staff salaries linked to Members' salaries will inflate the amount of public expense to be incurred. We can also expect requests for larger appropriations to fund not only the congressional pay raise but also the ripple effect that it will have on other salaries in the Federal Government.

I do not know why the Congress cannot just say no. But we cannot.

Finally, and most importantly, approving this huge salary raise establishes a precedent that the 101st Congress can't "just say no." How is Congress going to ask its constituents to make sacrifices and tighten their belts when it has just loaded its own larder with a fat raise?

As an example of the ripple effect, the last time Congress gave itself a huge salary increase, 40 percent in 1969, it also gave Federal employees a 16-percent increase.

If Members of Congress do not now have the courage to either declare publicly that they want the raise or to actually reject the raise, I doubt that Congress will be able to successfully grapple with the really tough choices ahead with eliminating the Federal deficit.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter that I sent to President Bush today that asked him to come out and in opposition to this because he has not taken a position yet.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
January 25, 1989.

Hon. GEORGE BUSH,
President of the United States, The White House, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Today I introduced legislation, joined by a bipartisan group of 14 senators, to disapprove the 50% pay raise recommended to Congress by President Reagan on January 9, 1989. This legislation would disapprove the pay raise, which must occur by February 7th in order to prevent an automatic increase in salaries. Perhaps more significantly, this joint resolution would also rescind the pay raise if it had already gone into effect and would require a vote for any future pay increases. This legislation will keep pay reform alive well beyond February 7th. It will give Congressman Tom Tauke and his House colleagues time to generate support and passage of this proposed legislation. Additionally, it will communicate to the public that federal government officials are indeed serious about reducing the federal budget deficit.

I share your commitment to reduce the deficit. The tough decisions that Congress and the Administration must make, however, in the process of cutting spending, will not be taken seriously unless we are willing to start with ourselves. I do not understand how Congress or the Administration will be able to ask our constituents to pay increased taxes or cut back on government services when we have just give ourselves a huge increase.

As you know, the joint resolution which I have introduced must eventually be submitted to you. I realize that you have not taken a position on the pay raises recommended by President Reagan. In various press accounts, however, you have stated that you may "have something to say about that after January 20th." I would therefore appreciate your support for my legislation, or the concepts of rejecting the 50% increase and the need for reforming the process of pay increases.

Though the thirty day time period cannot be interrupted, and will undoubtedly expire without Congressional disapproval of the pay raise, your public support will restore faith in government for the 85 percent of the public which opposes the raise. Your support would also increase the momentum behind legislation to reject the pay raise, such as I have introduced today.

I look forward to working with you on this and other efforts to reduce the federal budget deficit!

Sincerely,

CHARLES E. GRASSLEY,
U.S. Senator.

P.S.—Mr. President, I believe it will be easier for you and the Congress to say "yes" to cuts in the budget if we say "no" to a 50 percent pay raise. You must choose between aligning yourself with Speaker Wright and a dozen in the House leadership who favor the raise * * * and the 85 percent of the American people who oppose the issue. I believe your leadership in budget reduction will be strengthened if you join with the 85 percent.

Thanks for your consideration.

C.E.G.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I am pleased to join many of my Senate colleagues in cosponsoring this bipartisan resolution to disapprove former President Reagan's proposed 50-percent pay raise for Members of Congress, Federal judges, and senior executive branch employees.

In this time of budget crisis—and I believe it is a crisis—it is unconscionable that the President would seriously support raising Federal salaries at the same time he is cutting programs which directly affect the lives of working Americans. We cannot tell working mothers that there is no money for child care programs and accept this raise. We must not tell our young people that we cannot afford to assist them in getting a college education and accept this raise. We cannot tell the American people that we do not have the funds to aggressively wage the war on drugs and accept this raise.

And we must not allow this raise to go into effect by not taking any action to prevent it. Every Member of Congress should be on record indicating his or her support for or denial of the proposed 50-percent pay increase. Preventing Congress a chance to vote on this legislation would send a signal to the Nation that Congress is unwilling to address the deficit in a straightforward and realistic manner.

This joint resolution of disapproval, which conforms with the provisions of the current Federal Salary Act, disapproves the proposed pay increases for all branches of the Government. It also amends the current law to ensure that any future pay raises will be subject to an affirmative vote of Congress. The Senate has been on the record in the past in supporting these actions.

Finally, a provision is included which really puts teeth in the resolution. It provides for a rescission of the raises for the legislative and executive branch if, for some reason, the proposal goes into effect. This provision would keep the spirit alive and keep the pressure on Congress to take the necessary steps to eliminate the raises.

I am pleased that my colleagues who have been so active on this issue in the past are continuing their efforts. Senators GRASSLEY, REID, PRESSLER, and others are to be congratulated for their fine work. I am confident that the Senate will overwhelmingly oppose these increases and I am hopeful that the House will do the same. We must first resolve our budget crisis before we even consider increasing our pay. The voices of the American people loudly call out in unison in opposition to the proposed raises. Congress must listen to their voices.

A TRIBUTE TO THE GARDEN CLUB

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, I rise to pay tribute to the Garden Club of America, its 187 member clubs, and its thousands of members coast to coast.

The Garden Club of America, founded in 1913, is best known for flower shows and horticultural education, two very important parts of its mission. But it is in the areas of environmental education and community involvement that the quiet work of garden clubs often goes unnoticed.

Over the years, garden club members have worked hard to educate Government officials and the general public on important environmental issues, from the prevention of pollution to the preservation of public land, from protection of endangered species to maintaining the scenic beauty of our highways. Garden clubs have supported summer intern programs in national parks and scholarships in environmental studies.

Of particular interest to me is the Garden Club of America's work in raising the awareness of members and their communities about the critical issues our Nation faces in the protection of our water supply. Much of the water we use in our homes is wasted, and through public education programs such as these we can all learn to use water more efficiently.

At the local level, where things really do happen, Mr. President, garden clubs participate in varied activities, from the preservation of historic homes and gardens to civic landscaping, from urban planning to recycling campaigns. Garden club members have been the moving force behind the establishment of neighborhood nature centers and vegetable gardens, as well as numerous parks and recreational facilities.

It is through these activities that the thousands of active garden club members nationwide stimulate the love of gardening and improve the quality of the environment. I can think of few more worthy pursuits, few accomplishments for which our children and grandchildren will thank us more, than those promoted by garden club members.

Mr. President, I ask my colleagues to join me in honoring the Garden Club of America and the thousands of garden club members for their public spirit and public service. I wish them the best of luck in continuing their worthwhile and effective efforts.

HON. JOHN O. (JACK) MARSH, SECRETARY OF THE ARMY

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, earlier this month I came to the floor of the Senate to criticize the lack of international concern that has been expressed regarding the bombing of Pan Am flight 103 and the construction of a chemical weapons facility in Libya. Today, I want to applaud the efforts of someone who has been a leader in supporting counterterrorist capabilities within the Department of Defense. I am speaking about the Honorable John O. (Jack) Marsh, who has served with great distinction as the Secretary of the Army for the last 8 years.

In 1986, Congress established the position of Assistant Secretary of Defense for Special Operations and Low Intensity Conflict to provide a high-level organizational focus on unconventional forces and missions within the Department of Defense. Senator NUNN and I introduced the legislation establishing this position because terrorism and guerrilla warfare are of increasing prevalence and have not been deterred by conventional means. In 1987, when it became clear that there would be delays in filling this position, Congress stipulated in law that the Secretary of the Army would assume responsibility for this new position until such time as a nominee could be confirmed.

Secretary Marsh did not seek this added burden. No doubt, he had enough to do as the Secretary of the Army. And because the establishment of this new office was opposed by the Defense Department, and entailed disruption of the status quo, Secretary Marsh was placed in the unenviable position of having to push for many uninvited and often unwelcome changes.

Over a year elapsed between the time that Congress created the new Secretariat and the time that Secretary Marsh took command. During that interval, progress was negligible. For example, after an entire year, the new Secretariat still did not have a charter, many of the key staff positions remained vacant, and much of the paltry staff that did exist were stuck in office space outside the Pentagon. It seemed that nothing was happening.

There was an abrupt transformation, however, after Secretary Marsh became responsible for implementing the law establishing this new office. Positions were filled, important programs for special operations forces received full funding, a charter for the office was approved, and office space inside the Pentagon was obtained for the staff of the new secretariat. Secretary Marsh's vigorous and conscientious response to the responsibilities Congress gave him—which he did not seek—is characteristic of his personal and professional integrity. And the fact that he was able to achieve so much so quickly, despite intense bureaucratic opposition and his other weighty responsibilities, is clear evidence of his skill in managing difficult issues in the Defense Department.

I cite this example of Secretary Marsh's character and ability and because it was a service for which I was particularly thankful. But it is only one example of many.

During the Iran-Contra investigation, we learned that Secretary Marsh objected to requests for Army weapons because the purpose for which these weapons would be used was not specified. As it turns out, these weapons were intended to be part of the arms for hostages initiative. While it might have been easier to go along to get along, Secretary Marsh challenged the legality of these requests and forced a review by higher officials. Although Secretary Marsh was in some instances overruled, his actions protected the Army from the scandal that ensued.

Perhaps the greatest tribute one can pay to Secretary Marsh, however, is simply to point out the manner in which he has quietly and effectively discharged the weighty responsibilities of his office. By all indications, today's Army is better trained, equipped, and educated than any of its predecessors. Morale and retention are up, and problems such as drug abuse and racial tensions are down. It is also worth noting that Secretary Marsh has served in his post longer than any Service Secretary in memory. In fact, if he remains Army Secretary until February 6, which seems likely, he will have established the all-time record for duration among Service Secretaries—surpassing even Henry Dearborn, who served as War Secretary under Thomas Jefferson from March 5, 1801, until March 7, 1809. No doubt, Secretary Marsh has had numerous opportunities to leave his post for far more lucrative positions in the private sector. Instead, he has gone the entire distance with President Reagan.

At a time when the public is hearing a great deal about Pentagon procurement scandals and the trials of those involved in the Iran-Contra affair, it is a pleasure to be able to draw attention to an official who has been a model of selflessness, effectiveness, and dedication to the public interest. Secretary Marsh's performance as Secretary of the Army has truly been in the finest tradition of public service and I commend him for it.

LEGISLATIVE AGENDA OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I rise today to commend and extend my deep gratitude to Senator INOUYE for his leadership of the Select Committee on Indian Affairs. With his devotion and guidance, the committee established an impressive record of accomplishment during the 100th Congress. I am pleased and honored to have the opportunity to serve as the vice chairman of the committee during this Congress. I look forward to a continuation of the bipartisan spirit of cooperation which has marked Senator INOUYE's tenure as chairman. I also want to extend my welcome to Senator COCHRAN and Senator CONRAD. I am pleased that they will be joining us on the committee and look forward to working closely with them.

It is my hope that during this Congress we will see a great strengthening of oversight capabilities and functions of the committee. During the past 15 years, the Congress has enacted several major bills relating to Indiana. I believe that it is very important for us to use a portion of our time in this Congress to assess the implementation of this legislation and, as appropriate, to refine it. I am also very concerned about several areas which have not been addressed by the Congress for many years. Among the issues which we need to examine anew are Indian forestry programs and irrigation systems. The implementation of Federal environmental laws on Indian lands should be thoroughly reviewed. We must take steps to assist tribal governments to improve law enforcement and the administration of justice in Indian country. Innovative and bold measures are needed to improve the deplorable economic conditions on the reservations. And last, but certainly not least, we must find effective ways to end the tragic physical and emotional abuse which plagues Indian children and families.

Mr. President, the need for careful review and deliberation is great. I am gratified to serve with a chairman and a committee which shares this view. I look foward to a productive Congress in which we identify and enact constructive approaches to these and other issues.

INDIAN DEVELOPMENT FINANCE CORPORATION

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, one of the top priorities of the Indian Affairs Committee, and one of my personal priorities, in the 101st Congress is to encourage the development of Indian reservation economies. In the 100th Congress, the committee held numerous hearings to solicit comments on ways to improve current programs as well as to explore new ideas which would better assist tribes in alleviating the harsh economic conditions found on Indian reservations.

One alternative is a bill that Senator INOUYE is introducing today calling for the establishment of an Indian Finance Development Corporation. While I support the concept of an institution which would provide development capital, business assistance, and loan guarantees to Indian businesses, I must refrain from cosponsoring the bill in the same form as it was vetoed last year. Unfortunately, the administration did not fully participate in our deliberations on the Indian Finance Corporation. Nonetheless, the President's veto message did raise several concerns which need to be fully addressed. Among those concerns are: possible duplication of programs authorized by the Indian Financing Act and Federal oversight of the financial activities of the Corporation.

The issues raised in the veto message cannot be ignored simply because a new administration has taken office. The issues raised transcend administrations to the question of how can we best utilize precious Federal dollars to effectuate real change in Indian reservation economies?

I am committed to exploring every realistic proposal which will provide tribal governments with a set of economic tools to encourage business development on their lands. In the near future, I will be reintroducing a new version of the bill I introduced last year which utilizes Federal tax incentives to encourage greater tribal-private sector partnerships. This bill, which has been the subject of review by a group of Indian economic experts, will be a mixture of select Federal tax incentives and other forms of Federal assistance. I look forward to a thorough discussion on this bill as well as the Development Finance Corporation bill.

With regard to the Development Finance Corporation, I would like to see the new administration become fully engaged in our deliberations. There is no doubt that there is a need for capital investment in reservation economies. There also can be no doubt that the Federal Government cannot afford to duplicate programs and services already available. I am prepared to work with the administration and Chairman INOUYE to find new ways to address the deplorable economic conditions in Indian country. With deliberate effort and the full participation of all parties, I am confident that we can reach agreement on legislation which will provide for increased public and private support for the development of reservation economies.

DEATH OF WILLIAM NICHOLS, A U.S. REPRESENTATIVE FROM THE STATE OF ALABAMA

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, like all of my colleagues in the Congress, I was deeply saddened by the death last December 13 of my close friend and colleague Congressman Bill Nichols.

I knew and worked with Bill Nichols from my first days in the U.S. Senate. As a member of the House Armed Services Committee, Bill worked tirelessly to promote a strong and effective national defense. When I was chairman of the Manpower and Personnel Subcommittee of the Armed Services Committee in the mid-1970's, Bill Nichols was my counterpart on the House Armed Services Committee. His dedication and commitment to the men and women in uniform was evident to all. I recall our work on the landmark personnel legislation of the 1970's—the Defense Office Personnel Management Act and the pay and benefits legislation of the late 1970's.

Bill Nichols became involved in another piece of landmark defense legislation in the 1980's—the effort to reorganize and reform the Pentagon. The passage of the Goldwater-Nichols Department of Defense Reorganization Act of 1986 represented the most far-reaching reform of the national security establishment since the National Security Act of 1947. Along with Senator Goldwater, Bill Nichols was one of the driving forces behind this milestone legislation, and his colleagues in the Congress recognized Bill Nichols' role in this historic effort by naming the legislation after him and Senator Goldwater.

Bill Nichols ably represented the people of the Third District of Alabama for 22 years, but he was also a statesman of national stature. All of us in the Congress will miss his wise counsel and gentle humor.

Secretary of the Navy William Ball also knew Bill Nichols well, and Secretary Ball recently wrote a very moving tribute to Bill Nichols. I ask unanimous consent that Secretary Ball's tribute, most of which appeared in the Washington Post on January 3, be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the tribute was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMEMBER BILL NICHOLS

(By William. L. Ball III)

There will be sensed a missing presence as members of the House of Representatives are sworn in at the Capitol today. Sadly, the Third District of Alabama will not be represented, its citizens having gathered to bury their Congressman ten days before Christmas.

To colleagues, constituents, and those both in and out of government who knew him, Bill Nichols was a man of uncommon strength and uncommon virtue. His way was that of one who had been tested by hardship time and again, who had bested obstacles few would ever confront, and yet who instinctively never forgot the simple rule at the core of his steady values. To exercise good sense, which was his practice, he knew that a Congressman had to remember who he was . . . and where he came from.

To fellow southerners, he was a model public man, admired for his considerate treatment of people from all stations in life, his agreeable manner and his genuine interest in the circumstances of others . . . his selflessness, unquestioned integrity, and the strength of his convictions. For a time in Alabama he was a cotton man, which meant above all he was fair. Always fair.

So obvious were these qualities in Bill Nichols and so sudden his departure from us that no amount of mourning can compensate for the tributes he deserved here but never received. So many were those whom he inspired in the old-fashioned way—not by image but by living example—that he leaves empty on this day far more than one seat in the House.

There is a diminished roster now in the Congress of those who had a part in two of the traumas of this the American century. Bill Nichols saw what the Great Depression wrought on the rural South—his eleventh birthday was two weeks before the stock market crash. Twelve years later he left Auburn University for combat service in the German forests on the front lines of World War II. Those experiences gave to Bill Nichols and thousands of others who survived war and depression an extraordinary and even historic determination to succeed, to serve, and to create opportunities for America's next generation.

And that's exactly what they did. With an impact and reach none could foresee in 1945, they rebuilt, retooled, and regenerated over the span of four decades a country that without them surely would not have hit full stride.

So, of the achievements of Bill Nichols and the legacy of his generation, my generation ought to pause and take note. The gentleman from Alabama worked hard to preclude the repetition of mistakes for which his generation paid an awful price. The lessons of his remarkable life are many and the good of the republic requires that they be heeded. And were he here today and asked by the freshman House Members in the class of '88 what one thing they above all should do . . . well, he would smile, and with that good-natured twinkle in his eye suggest quietly that a Congressman ought to always remember who he is . . . and where he comes from.

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR JOHN MELCHER

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, as the 101st Congress convenes this year, we will all miss the wisdom and insight of a man I had the pleasure to work with for many years.

No longer will Senator John Melcher, the Senate's only veterinarian, be seated at my right side as ranking majority member of the Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

I am sure I speak for all members of the committee when I pause to pay tribute to a rugged individualist who will be missed by farmers and ranchers across America.

But, primarily, he will be remembered as a man who took on concerns for the poor and the hungry the world over. He realized that farming is not only growing food, it is also feeding people.

Where borders and income levels have divided men, women and children, Senator Melcher helped remind the more fortunate among us that we are, all of us, inhabitants of the same world.

Coming from the sweeping wheat fields of Montana, he realized more than most of the incredible ability of our Nation to feed itself and much of the world, and he saw how much of that was not being done.

He felt the terrible injustice of stockpiling huge agricultural surpluses while millions go hungry, and committed himself to rectifying the irony.

In the Senate, he reflected his concern for persistent hunger and malnutrition with continued support and development of legislation to help the hungry.

In the last Congress, he moved the agricultural aid and trade mission into law.

In the last year, I had the pleasure to work with Senator Melcher on the most significant improvements to our Federal food programs in over a decade, the Hunger Prevention Act of 1988.

As always, he took the lead on TEFAP, the Temporary Emergency Food Assistance Program, which provides up to 15 million malnourished Americans each month with modest amounts of surplus commodities. His help in instituting crucial improvements extended this vital lifeline for 2 years.

He will no longer join us at the Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry table. But we will continue to work in the spirit of humanity and achievements set forth by Senator John Melcher of Montana.

I ask unanimous consent that the following article be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was order to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OF MELCHER AND HIS JOB WELL DONE

(By Colman McCarthy)

In his last days as a senator, John Melcher, the Montana Democrat, is tending to a final constituent service. It involves housing for two of his most loyal supporters, Abigail and Eddie. They are the office cats, a pair of golden-hair short-tailed Manxes that Melcher, the only veterinarian in Congress, has had as longtime companions.

Post-Senate life promises to be sunny for the cats—they'll end up in homes, not alleys. It will be fine, too, for Melcher. He leaves with achievements, not memories. His narrow defeat in November, after 12 years in the Senate and seven in the House, ends a career marked by consistent liberalism and free of the common Senate viruses, vanity and sophism. Next to the Kennedys, Doles and other well-publicized Byrds of bright plumage, Melcher was content to be one of Washington's best-known unknown senators.

His politics had little padding. He was a core-issue man, a farm-state senator who knew that agriculture should be as much about distributing food as growing it. In the current farm bill, the trade and food assistance sections originated with Melcher. In the last Congress, he pushed the Agricultural Aid and Trade Mission bill into law.

Melcher persisted with one argument: For both economic and moral reasons, effective distribution of food should be a major part of the nation's farm policies: "We Americans have food in massive oversupply," he said in 1985. "That oversupply has crushed farm prices. We must dispose of the surpluses in order to strengthen prices, and we should dispose of them by feeding the starving and hungry overseas and the malnourished at home." Millions of Third World people who never heard of John Melcher are getting food because he worked to deliver it.

During the Reagan years when, club in hand, government officials ended the war on poverty and began a war on the poor, Melcher and other senators were forced into defensive legislation: working for amendments to keep things from worsening. One effort was typical. In the summer of 1986, some midlevel numbers people in the Reagan administration played with their calculators and decided that $300 million should be transferred from African famine-relief programs and Food for Peace. The money would go to El Salvador, Honduras, Guatemala and Costa Rica for unspecified economic-development programs. Melcher, seeing the transfer as a hustle to take money from the hungry of Africa to feed the Reagan-Elliott Abrams political agenda for Central America, led a 51-49 vote against the raid.

Such public interest groups as Bread for the World found Melcher to be ever available and approachable. On coming to the House in 1969, he aligned himself with environmental groups then working to enact the first federal strip-mine legislation. Eight years would go by before a law passed, with Melcher and Rep. Morris Udall (D-Ariz.) as two of the leaders.

Melcher's availability showed in personal traits. In 1983, a group of Catholic sisters in Washington raised money to provide a day shelter for homeless women. A Sunday afternoon ceremony was planned for the opening. Because it was a shelter for women that was to be staffed by women, it was thought that women members of Congress should be asked to attend.

Invitations went out. Someone of egalitarian bent suggested that perhaps one male politician ought to be invited. Melcher, who had a daughter who worked with homeless women in Tucson, was chosen.

That Sunday afternoon, at Rachel's Women Center, none of the women members of Congress showed up. Melcher, accompanied by his wife, did. He spent much of the afternoon in the living room and kitchen talking with poor women. He donated money when he left, and told the Catholic sisters to call him or his staff when they needed help extracting food stamp or Social Security benefits for the women.

As a Western liberal, Melcher was part of a long line of progressives sent by Montanans to Washington: Jeannette Rankin, Thomas Walsh, Lee Metcalf, Mike Mansfield. Last month, Feminists for Life, a Kansas City, Mo., group, issued a report on Senate voting records. Three categories—antiwar, antiabortion and economic justice—were examined for what the feminists called "the consistent life vote." On 15 bills or amendments, Melcher scored 100—the only senator to be 15 for 15. Not that the American left especially wants to notice, but Melcher's opposition to abortion belies the comfortable stereotype that it's only the fanatic right that is prolife. What's liberal, he asks the left, about destroying the unborn?

John Melcher's work in the Senate benefited farmers, miners, the elderly, the hungry and a constituency of the world's poor. If all those who had been helped by him—from Washington's homeless women to the Bangladesh starving—could have voted in Montana, he would always have run unopposed.

FRED D. GRANT, CONVERSE COUNTY SCHOOL BOARD MEMBER

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I rise to pay tribute to Fred D. Grant of Glenrock, WY, for his record of more than 50 years of service on the Converse County Wyoming School Board. In recognition of this loyal and unprecedented service, Fred was recently awarded the Golden Bell Award by the Wyoming School Board Association. In addition to the Golden Bell Award, Fred also won the Glenrock Area Chamber of Commerce Award for Outstanding Rural Achievement in 1975. Today, his community will honor Fred for his contributions to the school board. I join with them in congratulating a great public servant for a job well done.

Fred's remarkable record of achievement and dedication to Wyoming's public education system began in 1928 when he served as a board member and treasurer of Converse County Elementary District 16. He held that post until 1956 when that district was consolidated to form Elementary District 18. Fred then served district 18 as a board member and clerk from 1956 until January, 1972, when Converse County was reorganized into two school districts. Since the inception of Converse County School District No. 2 in 1972, Fred has held every office of the board, including his current position as chairman.

Born in 1904, Fred attended rural schools in Converse County Elementary District No. 16 until 1922. The remaining 2 years of his education were completed at Glenrock-Parkerton High School where he was active in football and basketball. He was among the students of the first class to graduate in 1924.

In 1928, Fred married Evelyn Stoddard and moved to a ranch 20 miles from town. They had two children and also raised a niece, putting her through high school and college. Fred has been active in the farm bureau and is a charter member of the Glenrock Soil Conservation District. He is also an active Mason, Odd Fellow, and a member of the Canton Marching Group. At the age of 84, Fred is still an active member of the Wyoming Stockgrowers Association and a rural fire warden.

Mr. President, Fred is a very genteel, quiet, and unassuming person, highly respected by all who know him. More importantly, this man's life should serve as an example not only to his children and grandchildren, but to all of Converse County, to Wyoming, and indeed all Americans. He not only appeals to our high moral standards, he embodies them. His service to the people of Wyoming is unparalleled and I hope my colleagues will join me in thanking Fred for all he has done to improve education and the quality of life in his community. Fred, I extend my heart and my hand to you for your honesty, your loyalty, and your faithful service to your fellow man. You make me feel proud and honored to serve Wyoming.

A FOND FAREWELL TO A LOYAL EMPLOYEE

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I take this opportunity to express my appreciation to one of our most valuable employees, Timothy Sean McAnarney, who is leaving our Senate staff in order to join the private sector.

Tim, though young in years, has worked with me longer than any other member of our U.S. Senate staff. Tim McAnarney and I first worked together from 1972 to 1977 during my terms of service as State treasurer of Illinois. Tim had the dual role of assistant director of the Banking Division and deputy investment officer, positions which entailed overseeing the investment of between $300 and $500 million daily.

Tim then joined me as administrative assistant following my election as Illinois secretary of state, performing important sundry duties and tasks until 1980.

In 1981, Tim became special assistant when I was elected U.S. Senator from Illinois. For the past 8 years, Tim has served ably as director of my downstate Illinois office in Springfield, which is our State capital. During the last 8 years, Tim has worked with individual citizens and local and State officials, assisting whenever and wherever he could.

Timothy McAnarney has an abiding interest in government, as evidenced by his academic career. He graduated from Creighton University in Nebraska in 1972 with majors in political science and journalism, and a minor in philosophy. He holds not one, but two masters' degrees. One is a masters in public administration, with a concentration in local government and its relation to State and Federal Governments. The other is a masters in community development, with a concentration in urban development and its related problems. Both of these degrees were granted by Sangamon State University in Illinois.

Tim McAnarney is now embarking on an independent career as a consultant in politics and government. He is well prepared for this task as a result of his experience at the local, State, and national levels.

IN HONOR OF LEE THOMAS, ADMINISTRATOR, U.S. ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION AGENCY

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today out of admiration and respect for Mr. Lee Thomas, Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency for the past 4 years. Mr. Thomas personifies the American public servant, a species, as I have stated before, that is on the verge of becoming endangered, and whose merits have been very much underestimated if not denigrated.

Mr. Thomas has been in administrator of great ability. He joined the EPA in 1983 as an Assistant Administrator under Bill Ruckelshaus, and helped to restore confidence in an agency that has suffered great harm at the hands of irresponsible and incompetent managers. His work at that time on the Agency's Hazardous Waste Program helped to solve some of the most troubled and persistent problems facing the country. This could not have been accomplished had it not been for his balance of judgment, integrity, and ability.

It is no reflection of Mr. Thomas that he worked for an unsympathetic administration that clearly placed its priorities in areas other than the environment. The administration owes a great debt to Mr. Thomas for keeping the Agency respected under these conditions.

As we say goodbye to my friend, Lee Thomas, we wish him well. It is safe to assume that we have not heard the last from Lee. I look forward to working with him in the future. I congratulate him on a job well done.

SAVING THE PANDA

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, the charisma of the giant panda enchants Americans. We wait in long lines to see pandas. Their mating habits are front-page news. But the role accorded the panda by China as a unique kind of goodwill emissary is proving dangerous, perhaps even fatal, to the panda's survival as a species.

The distinguished biologist George B. Schaller, writing recently in OMNI magazine, expresses deep concern for the survival of the panda. He offers some helpful thoughts on what can be done to save the species.

As Schaller points out, "ultimately the responsibility for saving the panda rests with China." But it is important that all of us who care for this incredible species be alert to the threats to pandas and be ready to support our Chinese friends in the choices they must make to assure the panda's survival.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article by George B. Schaller be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHINESE ARE CHIEF PANDA STEWARDS

Pandas are China's ambassadors of friendship; they are symbols of our effort to protect the environment. Decoratively colored and with an innocent, childlike quality, the panda has an extraordinary spiritual resonance. Why else would people endure long waits just to watch pandas sleep? Why else would there be an almost voyeuristic interest in their reluctant romances every spring?

Burdening this gentle, self-contained animal with symbolism, reverence, and adulation is harmless. But we also have a moral obligation to assure the species a future in its mist-shrouded mountain home. In this we have so far failed.

During the past decade pandas have declined in number. This has occurred in spite of legal protection, the existence of 12 reserves, and a joint China-World Wildlife Fund conservation program.

Currently China holds far too many pandas in captivity—about 100. The breeding record of these captives is dismal; two or three births a year, usually as the result of artificial insemination. Scattered in zoos and other facilities, the pandas are not part of any coordinated breeding program, and most animals don't ever get an opportunity to reproduce. Those that have cage mates show unexplained restraint; the males being especially inhibited suitors.

I believe all those pandas captured during the bamboo die-off should be given their freedom, for in the wild they will surely breed. . . . There should also be a moratorium on capturing pandas. The animals reproduce so slowly that every individual still in the wild should remain there. Instead, China is investing huge sums to build panda-breeding centers. I have a nightmare of more and more pandas being drained from the wild, until the species exists only in captivity.

In 1974 there were about 145 pandas in Wolong Reserve. Twelve years later there were 72. This startling decline was caused by poaching—villagers who live near the reserve set snares throughout the forest to catch musk deer. The musk gland is a high-priced commodity used in traditional medicines. Pandas are inadvertently strangled by the snares set for the deer. And in recent years they have been killed for their hides, many apparently smuggled to Japan. When I visited the Jiuzhaigou reserve in 1983, I saw so many snares that I was surprised to find any pandas left at all.

As of August 1987, the penalty for killing a panda could be as severe as life imprisonment or death. Because forests are seldom patrolled, however, few poachers are apprehended. China is proud of its effort to save the panda, but, if the government continues to neglect the poaching problem, it may lose the animal it considers a national treasure.

After China loaned two pandas to Los Angeles in conjunction with the 1984 Olympics, zoos began an undisciplined scramble to obtain pandas, and China was eager to proivde them. It soon became a rent-a-panda program, with each country collecting huge profits. Instead of being part of a breeding program in China, pandas have taken to the road to entertain an enthusiastic public that sees only a clownish face, not the image of a dying species.

Ultimately the responsibility for saving the panda rests with China. If the Chinese fail to make the correct choices now, only a few will linger in captivity, mementos of a better past.

—George B. Schaller, director of science for Wildlife Conservation International, author of "The Giant Pandas of Wolong," and former leader of WWF's panda program in China.

VERA MIOSSI

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, Vera Miossi at the age of 97 died on Tuesday, October 18, in San Luis Obispo. The day before her death she had cast an absentee ballot for the November 8 election. It was the 20th consecutive Presidential election in which she had voted starting in 1912. That was the year in which California first enfranchised women, 8 years before the adoption of the 19th amendment to the Constitution.

Vera Miossi was a native Californian, born in 1891 in San Luis Obispo County. She lived a full and productive life as a homemaker and community activist. Her home was the Miossi La Cuesta Ranch, where she lived for 72 years—and where she died.

Vera was an old and dear friend of mine. She and her family have been exemplary members of their community. I will miss her as will her many friends throughout California.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The period of the transaction of routine morning business has expired. Under the order, the Senate is now to proceed to go into executive session.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield for just a moment for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the majority leader yield?

Mr. MITCHELL. I yield for a question.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, it appears that the Senator from New Hampshire did not get a word in edgewise before the 3 o'clock arrangement. I wonder if the majority leader would permit an extension of 5 minutes prior to going into executive session.

Mr. MITCHELL. There are, in fact, several Senators who requested the opportunity to speak and introduce bills and resolutions. As I indicated to the Senator from New Hampshire and to them, if we got to 3 o'clock and Senators had not had the opportunity to make their statements and introduce their bills that I would then agree, after the votes later today, to have an additional period for the conduct of morning business within which time every Senator who wishes to do so would have the opportunity to speak and introduce bills. The reason the other Senators are not on the floor is that when I told them that they then left and will come back at that time.

So, if it is agreeable to the Senator, I will, at the conclusion of the last vote, which I now estimate will be about 6:15 p.m., determine how many other Senators there are at that time. I do know at least of two others. I will at that time make provision for the Senator and others to have the opportunity to address their remarks.

In the meantime, as the Senator from New Hampshire knows, the President has personally asked me to expedite the approval of his nominees for the Cabinet and the executive session is intended for that purpose. So I would like to proceed, in an effort to accommodate the President and his Cabinet nominees.

I note that the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee and the distinguished ranking member are here to begin that process. Would that be agreeable to the Senator?

Mr. HUMPHREY. It is an offer I cannot refuse. I just want to make it clear that I cannot constrain myself in my enthusiasm for the measure introduced by our colleague from South Dakota, and I am anxious to speak to it.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will now go into executive session.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

NOMINATION OF JAMES ADDISON BAKER III, OF TEXAS, TO BE SECRETARY OF STATE

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will report the first nomination.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of James Addison Baker III, of Texas, to be Secretary of State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the order, there will be 1 hour of debate on this nomination. The control of the time will be by Mr. HELMS and Mr. PELL, with half the time to be controlled by each.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I may need.

Mr. President, I have the honor and personal pleasure of recommending the confirmation of James A. Baker III as Secretary of State.

The Foreign Relations Committee held 2 full days of hearings on Mr. Baker's nomination for this post. We covered a lot of ground and raised a wide range of issues. I am pleased to report to my colleagues that Mr. Baker answered our questions forthrightly and well. On January 19, the committee voted by 19 to 0 to recommend his confirmation as Secretary of State.

Possibly the area in which the committee questions were most searching was that of legislative-executive relations. I am glad to report that Secretary Baker gave us his assurance that he would seek to consult fully and frankly with the Congress on foreign policy and national security issues. In this regard, as a condition of receiving the advice and consent of the Senate, he has agreed to appear and testify upon request before any duly constituted committee of the Senate. With this understanding, Mr. Baker has laid the basis for a productive working relationship and bipartisanship in the conduct of our foreign relations.

Virtually without exception, administrations begin with a reservoir of good will and a spirit of bipartisanship in foreign policy. Based on my almost 25 years on the Foreign Relations Committee, I can attest to the good intentions with which each new administration begins.

In my experience the basic mood of the Congress at the start of each administration is also hopeful that bipartisanship and an atmosphere of cooperation in foreign policy will be maintained.

The events that lead to a breakdown of bipartisanship in foreign policy almost always stem at least in part, often entirely, from a lack of openness and frankness in the consultation process. Who can doubt that, in recent years, the handling of such issues as Contra aid, the Iran-Contra affairs and the reinterpretation of the ABM

Treaty were major factors in the breakdown of executive-legislative relations.

To be sure, there are serious substantive disagreements about these issues—but those disagreements are nothing compared with the sense of betrayal and mistrust that results from the feeling of being misled or misinformed. This is what drains the reservoir of good will and leads to the breakdown of the consultation process itself.

Several of my colleagues have urged that there be regular consultations with the Secretary of State and other senior administration officials on foreign policy and national security issues. The Foreign Relations Committee and other concerned committees provide a forum for such consultations, and I would urge the new Secretary when he is confirmed to take advantage of our open door. We will always stand ready to meet with him. It is my personal hope that the spirit of full consultation and exchange of views that marked his confirmation hearings will be maintained into the new administration.

James Baker becomes Secretary of State as a close friend and adviser of the President. Never before in our history has a Secretary of State come to this office with such a special relationship with the new President. Several of my colleagues joined me in expressing the hope that this special relationship will strengthen the Secretary in ensuring the leading role of the State Department in the conduct of our foreign relations.

In particular, Mr. Baker indicated his awareness of and concern about the practice of our ambassadors and embassies abroad communicating to other agencies and the White House by means of back channels without the knowledge of the Secretary of State. I want the new Secretary to know that he will have our support in his efforts to secure and maintain the leading role for the State Department in our foreign policy. Departure from that principle has often led us astray, as we have seen particularly in the Iran-Contra affair and in other issues going back to the Bay of Pigs invasion on Cuba.

I conclude these comments by urging my colleagues to join me in supporting James A. Baker III for confirmation as Secretary of State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FOWLER). The Senator from North Carolina, Mr. HELMS, is recognized.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. President, James A. Baker III, hereinafter to be referred to as Jim Baker, is a man whose reputation is such that his nomination has been greeted with approval on both sides of the aisle. I appreciate the comments by my distinguished colleague and chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. Indeed, the distinguished chairman moved immediately to hold the hearings on Jim Baker's nomination even before the inauguration—indeed, even before the Senate officially received the nomination.

These hearings proved to be both frank and forthright. Of course, there were some matters to which Mr. Baker had not yet made himself acquainted, and that is understandable. But he freely promised to get back to the individual Senators who sought additional information. The reaction of the committee, in my judgment, was a tribute to the nominee's reputation in this city. Jim Baker is a man who has fulfilled search of his past reponsibilities in a capable and professional manner. He went out of his way to make himself available to members of the committee and other Members of the Senate. I think that bodes well for a foreign policy based on bipartisan consultation.

I believe Mr. Baker is uniquely qualified to carry out the President's objectives in the foreign policy field. And, of course, the President comes with a strong mandate from the American people. In the field of foreign policy, the President is enormously qualified and respected. As a matter of fact, both Presidential condidates, during the campaign touched hidden springs of patriotic national feeling and we, as a result, have emerged as a people with our national identity reinvigorated.

We are proud to be Americans in a world which sometimes seems to demand faceless internationalism.

A former distinguished colleague from Georgia, Herman Talmadge, used to say that the State Department has a China desk, it has a Central American desk, and it has an African desk. What the State Department needs, he used to say, is an American desk.

I remember applauding that statement by Senator Talmadge, and I must say here this afternoon, Mr. President, that if I am not mistaken, Jim Baker's desk down at the State Department is going to be that American desk. But we shall see.

The world, in any event, is remarkably different from 8 years ago. We face a new Soviet leadership that is more subtle and more effective in achieving its goals. As a matter of fact, as the President-elect said during the campaign, "We must keep our eyes open. We must be cautious."

Indeed, the Soviet Union is much stronger, militarily, than it was 8 years ago. It has modernized its strategic weapons system and it has tested them against the United States.

But the Soviet economy is bankrupt. And the question is whether the United States banks will be permitted to finance the Soviet deficit in order to bail them out. About that we shall also see. And we addressed that in the give and take, the questions and answers, during the confirmation hearings for Jim Baker.

President Reagan could and did, rightly, boast that not one square foot of territory has fallen to the Communists during his 8 years in office. But the freedom fighters are still fighting in Afghanistan. The freedom fighters in Nicaragua have been left high and dry by Congress. And already thousands of refugees are knocking at our door in their flight from Communist tyranny in Central America. In Namibia, the State Department has mediated an agreement that will almost assuredly result in a so-called democratic takeover, quote unquote, by a Marxist terrorist group called SWAPO.

The same agreement leaves dangerously exposed in Angola our ally, a man who visited many of us in Congress many times, who sat in the Oval Office with the President many times, Jonas Savimbi. Jonas Savimbi is being left dangerously exposed in Angola while the Cuban occupation force supposedly withdraws.

These are only some of the important problems which our Nation faces. There are others as well: The future of free market economies in South America, the role of Soviet intelligence services in spreading the drug trade, the need to eliminate the Communist insurgency in the Philippines, the rise of the European Community as a single trading area in 1992—our trade and financial relationships with the Pacific Rim.

Finally, I would focus just for a moment on the growing menace of the proliferation of chemical warface capability to nations having a long history of promoting terrorism. President Bush said, during the campaign, that there was one thing that he would like to be able to tell his grandchildren, and I quote Mr. Bush:

> Your grandfather, working with the leaders of the Soviet Union, working with the leaders of Europe, was able to ban chemical and biological weapons from the face of the Earth.

Well, this Senator as well would like to be able to tell my grandchildren that I helped the President and I helped the Secretary of State attain this goal. From my discussions with the distinguished chairman I know he shares this goal, too. As a matter of fact, we are sponsoring together legislation in this regard.

So, in summation, Mr. President, I look forward to working with Secretary Baker on these and other challenges, and with a new President, a new administration, we all have a chance to make a fresh start to protect the national interests for ourselves and for those grandchildren whom we love so well.

I reserve the remainder of my time, Mr. President.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I want to commend the Foreign Relations Committee for acting unanimously and promptly in approving President Bush's choice for Secretary of State, Jim Baker.

I have known Jim Baker for many years—as a political competitor, as a wise counselor, as a distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, and as a friend. He is a native of Houston who combines those praiseworthy qualities of intellectual toughness and personal friendliness. He comes from a family which has given our State generations of leadership.

Jim Baker has carried on that tradition here in Washington. By hard work and sound judgment, he has earned the respect of people here in Congress, throughout the executive branch, and even among usually skeptical journalists. His grasp of economic issues has won him the respect and admiration of the world financial community.

He has superlative credentials: an excellent education, military service, and two decades of private legal practice, including service on numerous corporate boards before coming to Washington. Throughout, he has maintained an impeccable reputation for integrity.

Jim Baker has also demonstrated talents particularly valuable in a Secretary of State, especially strategic vision and a sense of what is feasible. I saw that time and time again when I worked with him on Treasury Department matters like the 1986 tax bill and the revaluation of the dollar.

Like George Shultz, his distinguished predecessor, Jim Baker, is already an expert on those foreign policy issues which are becoming increasingly important—trade, debt, and economic growth. He also has the practical experience of successful negotiations with foreign governments on those very sensitive topics.

Jim Baker has promised a partnership with Congress on basic foreign policy matters. That is welcome, appropriate, and necessary if we are to avoid the suspicion and hostility which has sometimes hindered us in the past.

Mr. President, I strongly support Jim Baker as Secretary of State. President Bush has made a wise choice of a fine man.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island, the chairman of the committee.

Mr. PELL. I yield such time as he may need to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. President, I welcome this nomination of Mr. James Baker of Texas to be Secretary of State. I will vote to confirm the nomination. Mr. Baker obviously enjoys the trust and support of the President, as a result of their long professional and personal association. It is imperative that, with the important issues on the plate of the Secretary of State, decisions that affect our alliances and our basic relations with our adversaries must be made from a coherent sheet of music. The President and his Secretary of State have to be in sync.

Mr. Baker has a reputation as a problem-solver and as a pragmatist, and one who can work with others. Although Mr. Baker was understandably vague in his confirmation hearing on many of the cutting issues which will require decision by this administration, he made an effort to consult widely with committee members. He made welcome gestures toward the restoration of true bipartisan formulation of foreign and national security policies. The last 8 years have often been difficult and the bipartisan cohesion so necessary to act decisively and speak decisively as the leader of the West was strained and sometimes torn by stormy relations with the Reagan White House. Promises made by President Reagan were not always kept, and an atmosphere of trust did not develop. Indeed, while Mr. Baker was Secretary of the Treasury, there was a long period of unfortunate lack of cooperation in fashioning the concepts and language associated with the Omnibus Trade and Competitiveness Act. Although there was, finally, a measure of cooperation with the Congress on this matter, it was late in coming.

Regardless of that experience, and perhaps partly because of it, Mr. Baker appears to offer a renewed spirit of cooperation and consultation with the Senate, and I applaud that spirit. Indeed, a large portion of his remarks before the Foreign Relations Committee in his confirmation hearing on January 17, 1989, was devoted to this important problem. I, for one, am prepared to go more than halfway, go the extra mile, to forge a new cooperative spirit and cooperative arrangements with the new President and new Secretary of State. As an initial matter, I and my colleagues believe it important that a sensible consultative mechanism between the President and the Congress be established on committing the Nation to hostilities or into situations where hostilities may be "imminent," to quote from the War Powers Resolution of 1973. After 16 years of unsatisfactory experience since that legislation was passed by large majorities in both Chambers, it is overdue for a thorough overhaul and revision. That is the intent of the legislation which I crafted during the second session of the 100th Congress, and which bears the cosponsorship of the distinguished new majority leader, Mr. MITCHELL; the chairman and ranking member of the Armed Services Committee, Messrs. NUNN and WARNER; and the chairman and ranking member of the Intelligence Committee, Mr. BOREN; and Mr. COHEN, as well as Mr. DANFORTH. I hope other Senators will see fit to support this proposal. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee held hearings on it late in the last session, and there was not enough time for the extensive consideration that such legislation deserves on the floor of this body at the end of the last Congress. So I am reintroducing it now in the hope that this body will be able to address the issue and reach an agreement on the revisions I believe are necessary to make it a workable statute.

I hope that the appropriate committee, the Foreign Relations Committee, will be able to hold hearings on the measure. I am not saying that it is a perfect measure at all, but it is a good starting point and through the instrument of hearings and discussion and debate, the bill can be refined and, hopefully, enacted into law.

Mr. Baker indicated his willingness to work with the Senate on this matter during his confirmation hearing. In addition to the matter of war powers, there are many other important issues concerning which, if we work together, we can produce new solutions, such as the state of our alliance; arms control; trade relations; terrorism; international debt; and the state of American technology in the world, to cite just a few. There is a great deal we can do together, with a new common energy.

I look forward, therefore, to working together with Mr. Baker and his State Department team in the weeks and months to come in the 101st Congress.

I thank my good friend the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, for this courtesy in yielding time to me.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum and the time to be charged equally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quroum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, how much time remains on this side on the Baker nomination?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina is advised he controls 19 more minutes on the nomination of the Secretary of State.

Mr. HELMS. Nineteen?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Nineteen.

Mr. HELMS. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Kansas as much time as he may require.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Republican leader.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. President, once again, I want to enthusiastically endorse the nomination of Jim Baker to be Secretary of State.

I am proud to call Jim Baker a friend. Through the many years I have known him, I have learned something that I know President Bush believes strongly, too: If you want a job done right, Jim Baker is the one to do it.

I do not have to review his outstanding record of public service—a key player in virtually every Presidential campaign for the past 20 years; Secretary of the Treasury and White House Chief of Staff in one of the great Presidential administrations of this century; former senior official of the Commerce Department under President Ford; outstanding attorney in Texas for two decades.

He has been an "insider" in the best sense of that word; someone who has been at the heart of the action, and who knows how to get things done. He does his homework. He returns his phone calls, he responds to questions we have, and sometimes that is difficult to do with all the other duties he has.

He faces enormous challenges at State—how to handle Gorbachev's new style of Soviet leadership; how to keep the Western alliance strong and unified in the post-INF era; how to deal with terrorism and narcotics, with lunatics like Qadhafi and despots like Ortega. All of these challenges are going to be on Jim Baker's "plate." I am confident he is up to the job.

I should also note that Jim Baker brings to the job special knowledge of the international economic issues that, year after year, grow in importance: trade, debt, investment, exchange rates. Jim Baker understands them all.

And he understands, too, the need to work with Congress. His pragmatic, down-to-earth, straightforward manner is going to take some of the "foggy" out of Foggy Bottom.

President Bush could not have made a better choice. And I could not be more pleased that I am, to endorse this nomination, and urge Jim Baker's speedy, unanimous confirmation.

I thank the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, Senator PELL, and Senator HELMS for quick consideration of this nomination. It is a very important one. I understand if he is confirmed, as I know he will be, he will be sworn in as early as tomorrow because there are many things that need to be done.

I thank the distinguished ranking member on our side for yielding me time.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the distinguished Republican leader.

Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, as per our previous agreement.

Mr. SPECTER. I thank the distinguished ranking member of the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. President, I congratulate President Bush on his selection of the Honorable James A. Baker III as Secretary of State, and I am pleased to express my support and vote for his confirmation today.

My confidence in Jim Baker's ability and integrity arises from my dealings with him during the past 8 years in his capacities as Chief of Staff for President Reagan and Secretary of the Treasury. During President Reagan's first term, I worked with Mr. Baker on a variety of matters and found him to be prompt in responding both to his mail and telephone calls, which is a relatively rare attribute in Washington. Early on, when Senator HEINZ and I dealt with Jim Baker on a variety of State issues including Pennsylvania judgeships, we found a willingness for a workable accommodation while he represented the administration's positions with vigor and fidelity. He served the President and the Nation admirably in the very difficult role of White House Chief of Staff.

Mr. Baker displayed these qualities in the important position of Secretary of the Treasury. His dealings with his foreign counterparts and the U.S. business community demonstrated skill and knowledge on the difficult issues of international and domestic economics. In his appearances before Senate committees, including mine, he was candid, prepared, knowledgeable and articulate in expressing the administration's positions, and skillful and congenial in the responses to opposing Senators' views and there were many of those.

Prior to occupying these important positions in the Reagan administration, Jim Baker served with distinction as Under Secretary of Commerce, had a distinguished career at the law, and an excellent educational background including the Hill School at Pottstown, PA.

Beyond his work in Government, I have admired Jim Baker's political skills. In some difficult contexts during the recent Presidential campaign, I found him both fair and tough in his responses to some touchy political issues on which I helped. Before that, I found him available and helpful on political matters in Pennsylvania including my own reelection effort.

By all standards, Jim Baker is a man of ability with a potential to grow in international affairs and the important position of Secretary of State. Enjoying the confidence of President Bush as he does, he is an excellent choice for this important Cabinet position.

Since I do not have the opportunity to serve on the Foreign Relations Committee, and therefore have not had an opportunity to make any formal or record suggestions to the perspective Secretary of State, I think it appropriate to use this opportunity for a few observations since it is likely they will come to his immediate attention. In fact, I would be surprised if he were not watching these proceedings, brief as they are, on this matter of importance to him as well as to the country.

I urge the new Secretary of State to move ahead with negotiations on strategic arms reduction at an early date. While I understand the necessity for a new administration to formulate its own position on these complex issues, many of the key players, including the President himself, have had experience from positions in the Reagan administration. To the extent that study and reflection are required for any modification of positions, so be it; but there is much to be said for maintaining the momentum of the INF success and to move ahead as promptly as possible with the important issues of start.

Beyond the Executive's care in negotiations, there is the added review by the Senate on the ratification process. On the INF treaty, the Senate demonstrated its ability to make a thorough review and improve the negotiated product. The public record shows the extensive activities of the Intelligence Committee, on which I serve, and the improvements on verification.

On Mideast peace process, I offer some observations based on study of that region in connection with my positions on the Intelligence Committee and the Foreign Operations Subcommittee of Appropriations, including a recent trip to Iraq, Syria, Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Israel and Jordan.

I suggest extreme caution by the New Secretary of State and the United States in dealings with the PLO. I had substantial reservations about the wisdom of initiating discussions with the PLO based on its record of terrorism, including Chairman Yassir Arafat's personal involvement in the murder of the United States Ambassador in the Sudan in 1974. I found little comfort in Chairman Arafat's meeting the U.S. standards considering the fact that it took so much prompting for him to get it right. The words were veritably put in his mouth before he could articulate them in a way satisfactory to our State Department.

There was no showing of even rhetorical sincerity in that context. Immediately thereafter, as we all know, his PLO lieutenants limited the Arafat renunciation of terrorism, saying it did not apply within Israel, presumably even to civilian targets. Then a few days later, Chairman Arafat threatened Mayor Freij of Bethlehem after the mayor had proposed a truce with the end of violence with the Intifada and the reciprocal stopping of force by the Israeli Army. Arafat then compounded the untenability of his position by denying his spoken threat in the face of a tape recording of his voice held by our State Department.

During my recent trip to the Mideast, I had an opportunity to talk with Mayor Freij on Saturday, January 14, and based on my conversation with him there is no doubt in my mind that he was in fact threatened. As I say, there was a tape recording that threats came from Arafat's own voice.

Against this background, I urge the prospective new Secretary to reexamine the merits of our dealing with the PLO. At an absolute minimum, we should require the substantial showing by the PLO of deeds instead of rhetoric. They ought to be put to their proof with deeds as opposed to mere words.

When the new administration and the Secretary of State have had an opportunity to become familiar with the difficult Mideast issue, I hope Secretary of State Baker would carry forward the activism of Secretary of State Shultz during the past year to year and a half.

On these and other foreign policy issues, I know that my colleagues in the Congress and I stand ready to cooperate with the new administration and the new Secretary of State on finding workable solutions. I applaud Mr. Baker on his stated interest in an accommodation with the Congress which provides a promising opportunity to achieve President Bush's stated interest in a bipartisan foreign policy which provides unity beyond the water's edge.

I thank the distinguished ranking member for the time. I relinquish the remainder of my time and yield the floor.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, now how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Nine minutes.

Mr. HELMS. Nine minutes. I offer 6 minutes to the distinguished Senator from South Carolina and the other 3 minutes to the distinguished Senator from New Mexico, Mr. DOMENICI.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina, Mr. THURMOND, is recognized.

Mr. THURMOND. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I rise today in strong support of the nomination of James A. Baker III to the Office of Secretary of State.

As the fourth ranking person in the line of succession to the Presidency, the Secretary of State holds a position of enormous consequence in our system of Government. The Secretary serves as the principal foreign policy adviser to the President, and performs a vital role as a member of the National Security Council and as the first-ranking member of the Cabinet.

Mr. President, in my estimation, Jim Baker is eminently qualifed to serve as Secretary of State and I believe the unanimous 19 to 0 vote of the Foreign Relations Committee clearly reflects that fact. He is a man of the utmost integrity, and his remarkable energy and acumen have earned him the respect of those persons with whom he has worked and consulted. For the last few months of 1988, Mr. Baker served as the Presidential campaign chairman for George Bush. Prior to that, he established an impressive record as Secretary of the Treasury from February 1985 to August 1988.

Before serving as Secretary of the Treasury, he served 4 years as Chief of Staff and assistant to President Reagan.

His formidable negotiating skills and his capacity for hard work helped to secure passage in 1981 of President Reagan's landmark tax cut and spending reduction legislation. This legislation is responsible in large measure for the economic recovery our country is enjoying today. Moreover, Mr. Baker can list among his credits the important role he played in the successful legislative effort to place the Social Security Retirement Program on a sound financial footing, thereby easing the concerns of millions of our senior citizens whose economic survival depends on their Social Security benefits.

There were many other accomplishments while he worked at the White House, but they are too numerous to recite here. In short, the experience gained as Chief of Staff and as Treasury Secretary makes him particularly well-suited to serve in the position to which he has been nominated.

Mr. President, the fine record Mr. Baker has made for himself is but part and parcel of a distinguished professional career. After graduating from Princeton University in 1952, Mr. Baker served his country proudly as a lieutenant in the U.S. Marine Corps. Subsequent to his military service, he attended the University of Texas School of Law, graduating with honors in 1957. He then joined the law firm of Andrews, Kurth, Campbell & Jones in his native Houston, TX, where he practiced law for 23 years, and earned a reputation as a superb corporate lawyer. From August 1975 to May 1986, Mr. Baker served as Under Secretary of Commerce. Mr. Baker's strong sense of civic responsibility is evidenced by his active involvement in numerous public service projects, including the Texas Children's Hospital and Tumor Institute.

Mr. President, Jim Baker is a man of exemplary character whose work experience and education have prepared him well to meet successfully the enormous responsibilities of the office of Secretary of State. I have enjoyed working closely with Jim Baker in his role as Chief of White House staff and as Secretary of the Treasury, and I look forward to working with him in the future in his new capacity as the President's chief foreign policy spokesman.

I strongly support the nomination of Mr. Baker to this post. If confirmed by the Senate, as I am sure he will be, I have every confidence that he will perform the new duties with exceptional skill, as he has in the other positions he has held in the past.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. DOMENICI addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico, Mr. DOMENICI, is recognized.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I rise too in support of the nomination of James Baker as Secretary of State.

Mr. President, it has been my rare privilege in the last few years to get to know James Baker. We call him "Jim." On a personal level I consider him to be one of my best friends.

Perhaps I am somewhat prejudiced but, I do not believe that we have had a better public servant serving our country and President Reagan than James Baker. I am firmly convinced that when he has completed his term as Secretary of State, we will be able to say that there has been no finer Secretary of State in all our history.

He is just that kind of person. He does everything he undertakes well. He succeeds. He is talented. He understands and works hard with all kinds of people to achieve results.

In his confirmation hearing James Baker said the world is in a transition period. Nothing could summarize where we are better, and no one could serve America, President Bush, and the world better than James Baker as Secretary of State.

Mr. President, the world is moving rapidly toward democracy, toward personal freedom, toward more free enterprise and entrepreneurial spirit. If you would, the world is moving toward capitalism as the best economic system to produce goods and wealth for people.

James Baker understands that transition. He understands the world is changing our way in terms of the worth of an individual. America is a civil country, and wants to have a great civil effect on the free world, and on those who have not been so free. We represent more than military strength. I believe he understands that.

James Baker will work with other countries to see that the world remains at peace, that prosperity continues to abound in the world, and that the free institutions of government coupled with new economic and financial realities permit wealth and growth to spread to more and more people of the world. President Bush and Secretary Baker want to help create the kind of world that America is truly proud to be a leader in, and a leader of.

He will do that job, and do it well.

I know that in an hour or so we are going to be able to say to him, "Congratulations, and we hope you do a good job." The President was proud to submit his nomination to us. We are proud to confirm him in an official way as Secretary of State.

We say today, "Good luck, Mr. Secretary." You have a lot of friends and a big job. When you are finished the big job, we know you will have done well, and you will have even more friends, not only here but around the world. Those new friends will think well of you, our country, and our system of government.

I yield the floor.

Mr. PELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum with the time to be charged equally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I rise in support of the confirmation of James Baker to be Secretary of State. Mr. Baker is unusually qualified for the most responsible position in the land next to the Presidency. As Treasury Secretary in the past administration, he played an important role in developing domestic fiscal policy and was the principal officer in charge of this Nation's economic relations with the international community. As a chief of Staff to the President, he brought a modicum of order to that maelstrom of competing interests, the White House. And, unfortunately, for Democrats, he brought his vast organizational skills to bear as campaign advisor to then-candidate Bush.

Mr. Baker will need all of his experience and skills in his new job. In the Soviet Union, he faces a nation that has been reinvigorated by new leadership; it will be his job to assess whether or not that nation has truly changed its sports; it will be his duty to ensure that we rise to the diplomatic and political challenges posed by the new regime. In the rest of the world he will have to assess and protect United States interests in the face of a mounting Third World debt crisis, economic challenges posed by Japan, Germany and other industrialized nations, and violent regional conflicts.

Mr. President, the world has changed considerably in the last decade. The old assumptions have gone out the window. The world has grown complex; the United States is no longer alone in possessing military or economic power. There are new dangers, but also new opportunities. It is up to Secretary Baker to help guide us through this new world, to assess its challenges, and provide us policies to cope with them. I am confident that Secretary Baker has the wisdom to do these things.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I would like to say a few words about Jim Baker, our next Secretary of State. I have known him for a very long time.

He served in the U.S. Marine Corps, an institution I am privileged to have had some affiliation with through the years. He brings that background, together with the widest range of experience, to the Office of Secretary of State at a most critical time in the history of our Nation.

He follows in the footsteps of George Shultz, a man who won the admiration of the Congress of the United States and indeed the confidence of this institution and the respect of the people of our Nation. Jim Baker, in my judgment, will be able to pick up and carry right on with the same measure of confidence given him by the people, the same respect given him by this institution, the Congress, at a time when the world seems to be filled with uncertainties.

I just stepped out of the hearing, as did other colleagues present here, being conducted by the Armed Services Committee on the confirmation of John Tower. Many subjects have been raised thus far in that hearing, among them the need to provide for a national strategy—a strategy that recognizes the limited assets of this country, but the willingness of this country to not only protect our citizens but those of our allies and the free world.

It is my hope that Secretary of State Baker, hopefully Secretary of Defense John Tower, and the National Security Adviser to the President, can proceed to create volume 2 of the national strategy as required by the Congress. Volume 1 was presented to us last year. I hope volume 2 comes in perhaps a more timely fashion, because as we devise our defense budget, being guided by the priorities of President Bush and his predecessor, President Reagan, whose strong record of national defense is second to none in the history of our country, we will need the guidance of the Secretaries of State and Defense in our own reordering of those priorities in matching the budget that hopefully will be agreed upon between the executive and legislative branches to these funds.

So I wish Mr. Baker very well. I urge him to address at the earliest possible time such subjects as the growing threat of terrorism and the ever-increasing proliferation of chemical weapons.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to commend President Bush for his excellent choice of a Secretary of State.

James Baker III is uniquely qualified for the position to which we are about to confirm him.

A Secretary of State must be a person who enjoys the President's closest confidence. The Secretary must be able to command the respect of foreign leadership; must understand the political realities of the American system, and, I believe, must understand not only the diplomatic dynamics of international affairs but must also understand the economic realities.

Jim Baker has all of these qualities and many more. His confirmation, Mr. President, is a encouraging moment for those of us who have sought to increase U.S. exports and to improve the U.S. share of foreign markets.

As a former Under Secretary of Commerce, Secretary Baker is completely conversant with the needs of American business in the foreign trade arena. As a former Secretary of the Treasury, Jim Baker is an expert on our trade deficit.

If we are to deal properly with our trade imbalance, Mr. President, it is essential that our embassies abroad become the front lines in our battle. Our diplomats must put economic and trade matters in the forefront of democracy. Jim Baker is the man to lead in these endeavors.

Further, Mr. President, as Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Baker established himself as a world leader in the solution of international debt problems.

In the course of 2 days of hearing before the Foreign Relations Committee, Secretary Baker revealed a clear vision and a bold sense of initiative in dealing with our foreign relations problems.

I believe that his definition, in his opening statement, of the "five significant transformations" will long be quoted by students of foreign policy.

In the midst all that has been written about American foreign policy in the last decade of the century, Secretary Baker's five points cut clearly to the point and outline the challenges.

Throughout the 2 days, Mr. President, Secretary Baker fielded questions on every aspect of America's foreign interests. His grasp of the board concepts and the details was, indeed, remarkable. Those of us who have known Jim Baker have known of his brilliance, but we have rarely had such a clear demonstration of it.

The most encouraging note sounded in those hearings, Mr. President, was Mr. Baker's call for a new bipartisanship in foreign policy. This call, echoed by our colleagues from both sides of the aisle, and indeed from both sides of this Hill, promises us a new view of international affairs. It is possible that our outlook on the world abroad may provide us with the same view, no matter at which end of Pennsylvania Avenue we stand to look outward.

I firmly believe that President Bush, advised by Secretary Baker, stands the best chance of bringing back a truly national view of foreign affairs. I am encouraged that so many of our colleagues appear willing to join in that attempt.

It is a pleasure to join in confirming Mr. Baker's appointment as Secretary of State. I look forward to lending him my support in building a bipartisan foreign policy consensus and in expanding American trade.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I commend the chairman and ranking member of the Foreign Relations Committee for moving expeditiously to bring this nomination to the floor of the Senate.

After talking privately with Jim Baker, and listening to his testimony for 2 days before the Foreign Relations Committee, I am pleased to support this confirmation. Secretary Baker made significant commitments to the committee on a number of critical issues, and I am confident that he will stick to his word.

The world is a different place than it was 8 years ago. When measured against the yardstick of freedom, the world is a better place. Much of the credit for the success must go to the so-called Reagan doctrine—the former President's commitment to provide material support of anti-Communist freedom fighters. In his farewell speech, President Reagan noted that the Soviets are leaving Afghanistan, the Cubans are withdrawing from Angola, and the Vietnamese are on the verge of leaving Cambodia.

Mr. President, the Reagan doctrine has created an opportunity for peace with freedom in these conflicts. However, as promising as things now appear, there is still a long way to go In each conflict, there is the potential for either historic success or disastrous failure. As I stressed in the hearing, it will be the challenge of the next administration to transform these opportunities into true success.

On this score, I was encouraged by Secretary Baker's testimony. Secretary Baker unequivocally asserted that both he and President Bush are firm believers in the Reagan doctrine. He stressed that he sees no inherent conflict between providing material assistance to freedom fighters on the one hand, and promoting an atmosphere between the United States and the Soviets that fosters the liberalization of Soviet society. At a time when many conservatives are concerned that important regional issues will be relegated to the back burner in the quest for "détente," I welcomed his stated commitment to stand by the freedom fighters that President Reagan so successfully supported.

During the 2 days of hearings, we had an opportunity to question Secretary Baker closely on the specific nature of continued United States support to both the freedom fighters in Afghanistan and Angola. He unflinchingly pledged a continuation of United States military support to the Afghan resistance, as long as the Soviets continue to provide military aid to the Kabul regime.

He importantly reaffirmed that our objectives in Afghanistan do not solely call for the withdrawal of Soviet troops. Our objectives also call for a free expression of self-determination by the Afghan people, free from coercion or interference by any outside forces. This commitment is increasingly important, as it appears that by February 15, the United States will only have achieved part of our objectives. The next step—the restoration of a truly representative Afghan Government in Kabul, is equally important. To increase United States interaction with the Afghan resistance, Secretary Baker has agreed to review the unanimous proposal of the United States Congress, that an ambassadorial rank special envoy be named to the Afghan resistance.

With regard to Angola, Secretary Baker agreed that United States assistance to UNITA should continue until a genuine process of national reconciliation is reached that is fully acceptable to Dr. Jonas Savimbi. President Bush, in a letter this month, pledged continued United States support until a "process" of national reconciliation is reached in Angola. While this Senator applauds the initiative of the President, and the testimony of Secretary Baker, many Senators intend to closely monitor U.S. policy in the weeks and months ahead.

Secretary Baker heard Senators express concern for the future of Cambodia. As he enunciated in his statement before the committee, the United States "must work for a new Cambodia, free of both Vietnamese occupation and the genocidal Khmer Rouge." This Senator agrees with the admonition of Senator CRANSTON, that the United States must play a much more active role in pursuing our stated policy. Recent reports indicate that the Khmer Rouge is gaining strength and positioning for an active role in a future Cambodian Government. If the withdrawal of Vietnamese troops merely delivers the Cambodian people once again into the hands of the Khmer Rouge, the Cambodian tragedy will enter yet another season of suffering.

In addition to these important regional conflicts, Secretary Baker underscored the importance of our relationship with the Republic of China. He agreed to inform the Congress of requests that the administration receives from Taiwan, for military assistance, consistent with the Taiwan Relations Act.

Secretary Baker also highlighted the importance of our friends in Pakistan, and the opportunity to improve relations now that free elections have been held. Pakistan, despite bullying by the Soviet Union, has undergone a remarkable transformation to full democracy in recent months. We must continue to stand by our commitment to Pakistan's security and independence.

The question of the Middle East was discussed extensively during the course of the hearings. As a Senator who was in Lebanon when the United States Marine barrack was attacked, I am acutely aware of the obstacles to peace in that troubled region. I am also deeply aware of the very serious security concerns of our friends in Israel. Despite our past failures, this Senator joined with other members of the committee in encouraging the Secretary to resume our efforts anew, to try to bring some resolution to the conflicts of the Middle East.

On the fundamental question of the sanctity of human life, Secretary Baker reaffirmed support for the so-called Mexico City policy, which bars United States assistance to programs or agencies which promote abortion as a method of family planning. Indeed, he cited his intimate involvement in the formulation of this policy while he was Chief of Staff to President Reagan in 1984. Similarly, he saw no reason to change our policy toward organizations which support or participate in coercive abortion or involuntary sterilization. Since 1985, funds have been withheld from the United Nations fund for population assistance because of their involvement with the family planning program in the People's Republic of China.

Finally, Mr. President, this Senator was encouraged by Secretary Baker's willingness to apply his expertise from the Treasury Department toward a greater effort to foster free enterprise and private ownership through U.S. foreign aid programs.

Mr. President, the next Secretary of State will certainly have his hands full. Much has been written lately about the tranquil state of international affairs during this transition time. To be certain, President Reagan has passed on a remarkable legacy. Yet, there is much to do. President Bush and his Secretary of State have a historic opportunity to consolidate the gains of the past years.

This Senator welcomes Secretary Baker's overtures to work closely with the Congress. As was pointed out in the hearings, past conflicts with the State Department were not solely conflicts between the Democrats in Congress and a Republican administration. There were frequent conflicts between conservative Senators and the State Department. Many of the conflicts could have been avoided, with greater cooperation and a more receptive State Department.

In this spirit, I support the nomination of James Baker to be Secretary of State, and look forward to working with him on many important issues in the months ahead.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I am pleased to support the nomination of James A. Baker III to be Secretary of State. Mr. Baker is one of the most able people in Washington today, and I am confident he will be confirmed and will serve the country well as Secretary of State.

During his years of service to President Reagan, first as White House Chief of Staff and then as Treasury Secretary, Jim Baker earned a fine reputation in the Congress, in Washington, and around the country for his competence, his honesty, his dedication. I believe we can expect no less from him as Secretary of State.

Jim Baker will need those skills and more for the many challenges he will face. For I believe we are about to enter a dramatic period in American foreign policy, one full of opportunities. In United States-Soviet relations, we are on the verge of a new era of unprecedented cooperation. The Communist monolith is undergoing radical changes, and a new leader in the Soviet Union has called into question many of the assumptions which have guided the United States since World War II. The end of many regional conflicts and the ascent of democracy signal the beginning of a new era in the developing world, one in which the battles will be fought in the marketplace of ideas, not on the battlefield of war. These opportunities, along with many others, offer President Bush and Secretary Baker a chance to reshape the world.

Such moments in history are extremely rare. How we react to these challenges may well affect the next generation and beyond.

Two elements will be key to the success of this administration in foreign policy: continued cooperation between the superpowers, and renewed cooperation between the executive and legislative branches.

United States-Soviet relations have progressed at a dramatic pace in the last few years. The dialog begun by President Reagan and Mr. Gorbachev has placed us at the beginning of a new age of superpower relations. But it is only a beginning, and there is much to be done. The next few years will be crucial. A quick look at the superpower agenda tells the tale:

In arms control, the United States and the Soviet Union have agreed on an important framework for a significant reduction of our nuclear arsenals.

Negotiations are also about to begin to address the conventional forces imbalance in Europe.

The regional conflicts which have served as a thorn in the side of superpower relations are coming to an end.

The achievement of this agenda will require active and creative diplomacy. Good things do not, as the saying goes, always come to those who wait. We cannot sit back and cede the initiative to Mr. Gorbachev.

Unfortunately, Gorbachev's diplomatic maneuvers in recent months have created the impression that the United States and the Western alliance is willing to watch Gorbachev in hopes that he will continue to make unilateral concessions. And it has raised Mr. Gorbachev's stock in Western Europe to the point where, in some nations, he is more popular than the American President.

In spite of this, there are rumors that the Bush administration could undertake a lengthy review—perhaps up to a year—of our current strategic posture before resuming the START talks.

Such delay, in my view, would be both unnecessary and unwise. History will judge us harshly if we let this opportunity pass.

The new administration also offers us a new opportunity to renew the spirit of bipartisanship in foreign policy that has eluded us for the past two decades. The breakdown of the bipartisan consensus that marked the immediate post-war era has cost us dearly, as it has often divided the country, while sending mixed signals to friend and foe alike. During his testimony before the Foreign Relations Committee, Mr. Baker agreed, and declared that we must have bipartisanship to succeed.

The essential element to bipartisanship will be a strong working relationship with Congress. Mr. Baker has a head start in this area, because he is well known and well liked on Captiol Hill.

As I have emphasized to Mr. Baker both publicly and privately, however, the true test of bipartisanship will come over the use of force, the most critical issue in the foreign policy arena. In recent years, the United States has reached a full constitutional impasse on this question, as the executive branch has continually defied the war powers resolution, the mechanism established to reassert the congressional role in the decision to commit U.S. forces abroad.

I believe we can find a constitutional mechanism acceptable to both branches. But unless the two sides come to the table in good faith to negotiate such a compromise a resolution of this stalemate is impossible. Mr. Baker has pledged to work closely with Congress on this crucial question, so I look forward to his continued cooperation.

As we enter this new era in American foreign policy, we will need strong and steady leadership at the State Department. I am confident that Jim Baker has the ability to provide that leadership. I am eager to work with him, and I wish him well as he guides U.S. foreign policy into the 1990's.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, earlier this week I had the pleasure of joining my colleagues on the Foreign Relations Committee in voting unanimously to support the nomination of James A. Baker III, to be Secretary of State, and I plan to vote today on the Senate floor to confirm his nomination.

What I find particularly encouraging about the nominations President Bush has made to date is the professionalism of the individuals selected, nominations such as that of Larry Eagleburger to be Deputy Secretary of State, the assignment of Vernon Walters to be our next Ambassador in Bonn, and of Thomas Pickering at the United Nations. I emphasize this point because I think it is the key to building a strong bipartisan foreign policy. I think Mr. Baker and I are in agreement that a bipartisan approach is fundamentally essential to the development of a sound and effective foreign policy, whether with respect to East-West relations, the Middle East, Central America, or southern Africa.

I believe the people appointed thus far understand this—they understand the importance of including Members of Congress. It's smart politics and it's good foreign policy. I hope that Mr. Baker will give serious consideration to including bipartisan congressional representation in the whole range of foreign policy endeavors, from policy planning sessions to treaty negotiations and state visits. Bipartisan congressional participation in these and other functions sends a strong message and helps to underscore our political diversity and our unity of purpose.

Now let me turn to the Latin American region, the area of the world with which I am most familiar. To begin, I want to focus attention again on the matter of personnel. Speaking as chairman on the Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs, I want to make a special plea for expertise, quality, and professionalism for the region within the Department. There should be no ideological litmus test, and at a minimum the Assistant Secretary should have some firsthand knowledge of the region and be able to speak Spanish. While all nations of the region are important, Mexico, Brazil, and Argentina in particular deserve the very best people we have available.

I would like to focus my remarks on two areas, Central America and the Latin debt question. And by way of introduction, let me begin by saying the Bush administration has a golden opportunity to improve relations with our neighbors in this hemisphere in a way that the previous administration never understood.

Contrary to what others have thought, Mr. President, Central America is not the whole of Latin America. The emergency of democratic governments in Latin America over the past several years happened not because of our policies, but in spite of them. Today those new democratic governments are in severe jeopardy—in Argentina, Brazil, Peru. I have had a chance to discuss this matter with Mr. Baker and I feel confident that he understands this. I also know we are eager to get this matter behind us and to fashion a policy that will do just that. I am certain that Mr. Baker will have the strong support of the committee in fashioning such a policy.

The starting point is to recognize that the present policy toward Nicaragua and Central America failed. It failed to deal effectively with our security concerns as well as our political concerns. It held one hostage to the other and achieved neither. Clearly, it is not a policy we can "fall back on," and "tinkering" with it is no answer either.

What is urgently needed at this point is a new policy—a realistic and pragmatic one. Such a policy, in my view, will seek to protect our legitimate security concerns and, at the same time, help lay the groundwork for dealing with our legitimate political concerns. It will not seek the overthrow of governments, nor will it finance and support those who do. Rather it will fully endorse all of the provisions of the Esquipulas II agreement and use those provisions to vigorously pursue bilateral and regional negotiations.

In the absence of such a policy, we will be right back to the controversy that plagued us for nearly 8 years, and we will be unable to deal with the real problems confronting the nations of this hemisphere, starting with the debt issue. Foreign debt is the number one political problem throughout the region. To one degree or another, it bedevils every government from Mexico to Argentina. I plan to make it the major focus of attention in my subcommittee, and I hope to hold hearings on it early in this session.

In brief, let me say that there is no doubt in my mind that a double-pronged approach is needed. Some measure of debt reduction must be coupled with real economic reforms that will permit steady growth and development. Take Brazil, for example. We can all understand how burdensome it is for Brazil to carry an external debt in excess of $100 billion. What we can't understand is why less than 10 percent of Brazil's adult population pays taxes. Both problems must be addressed. The future of democratic processes and procedures in much of Latin American depends on it.

Mr. President, I will stop at this point. I look forward to working with Secretary of State Baker in the months and years ahead, and I, together with Congress and the American people, wish him well in his new post.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time of the nomination of Secretary of State designee James Baker has expired.

Under the previous order the nomination will now be laid aside temporarily and the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the nomination of Elizabeth Hanford Dole. Thirty minutes under the order has been allotted the nomination to be controlled by the Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. KENNEDY and the Senator from Utah, Mr. HATCH.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR

NOMINATION OF ELIZABETH HANFORD DOLE, OF KANSAS, TO BE SECRETARY OF LABOR

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the nomination.

The assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of Elizabeth Hanford Dole, of Kansas, to be Secretary of Labor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Thirty minutes have been allotted to the Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. KENNEDY, who controls 15 minutes and the Senator from Utah, Mr. HATCH, who controls 15 minutes.

The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I might use.

Mr. President, today the Senate has before it the nomination of Elizabeth Hanford Dole, selected by President Bush as his Secretary of Labor.

The Committee on Labor and Human Resources heard testimony last week from the nominee, and the nomination was unanimously reported with the recommendation that the nomination be confirmed subject to the nominee's commitment to respond to appear and testify before any duly constituted committee of the Senate.

As I noted at the hearing, the challenges facing us in the employment and labor arenas are daunting, our resources are limited, and the solutions are inevitably controversial.

But Elizabeth Dole is no stranger to such challenges. With her distinguished service at the Office of Consumer Affairs, the Federal Trade Commission, the White House, and the Department of Transportation, she brings to the Department of Labor a wealth of experience, a solid commitment to excellence in public service, and a remarkable record of achievement.

I might also add that in addition to her extensive executive branch expertise, our exhaustive committee background investigation has turned up the fact that she also has close ties to the legislative branch, reportedly even to the Senate leadership. This information was confirmed by the minority leader, who had the pleasure of introducing the nominee at our hearing last week.

I was encouraged by the nominee's testimony, and I am hopeful we will begin to see a fresh start at the Department of Labor. It is no secret that the past 8 years have been controversial times for American workers. Too often, the rights and needs of working men and women took a back seat to the pro-business ideology of the past administration. Enforcement of existing health and safety protections declined, and the development of new standards has been too slow to keep pace with the risks of the modern workplace.

But President Bush has pledged a positive approach on many of the issues facing workers. He has stated his support for an increase in the minimum wage, for reasonable parental leave policies by employees, and for more sensitivity to the problems facing millions of workers in obtaining safe and affordable child care and health insurance. Those issues are priorities for American workers, priorities for the American people, priorities for Congress, and I hope they will be priorities for the Bush administration.

That is a formidable agenda for any Secretary of Labor—perhaps the most formidable since the days of F.D.R. and Frances Perkins. My wish for Secretary Dole is this—may the combination of President Bush and his new Secretary of Labor be as successful in meeting the challenges of the 1990's as that illustrious combination of President Roosevelt and Secretary Perkins was in meeting the challenges of the past. I want the Senate to confirm her nomination.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BUMPERS). The Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I rise to wholeheartedly endorse and support the nomination of Elizabeth Dole to be Secretary of Labor. I thank Senator KENNEDY and Senator MITCHELL for holding the hearing and the scheduling of her nomination.

This floor action is very important and it is critical to a smooth and orderly transition that President Bush is able to have his Cabinet Members in place as quickly as possible.

I do not think there is a more important Cabinet Officer than the Secretary of Labor when you stop and think about the agenda and the jurisdiction that the Secretary of Labor has and the importance of it to America.

I applaud the selection of Elizabeth Dole for this key Cabinet position for many reasons.

First and foremost, Elizabeth Dole has demonstrated leadership in several top governmental posts. She has recently served in President Reagan's Cabinet as Secretary of Transportation, and this is a monumental task when you stop and think about it. Our Nation is tied together by a complex system of air traffic, railroads and, of course, interstate highways. To keep people and cargo moving as efficiently and safely as possible requires keen administrative ability as well as careful planning and analysis, all of which she has applied I think with aplomb in that position.

As President Reagan's Assistant for Public Liaison, Elizabeth Dole effectively communicated the President's views to the public and the public's views to the President. I know that she is committed to maintaining this two-way street for discussion and information as the Secretary of Labor.

I would also like to point out, though, this dialog is not limited to the representatives of organized labor and management. These are the two groups we usually think of when we talk about labor policy. Elizabeth Dole knows that the programs and policies of the Labor Department also affects the youth, disadvantaged minorities and women and communities as a whole.

As a member of the Federal Trade Commission, she had a balances approach, and she has balanced the need for regulatory safeguards with the need for invention, choice, and the lowest possible prices in the delivery of goods and services. This experience will serve her well as she balances all of the missions of the Department of Labor.

The Department of Labor, as I have mentioned, in my opinion, is one of the key agencies of the Federal Government. It bears much responsibility for the continued well-being of our entire Nation as well as for individual workers and their families. I am delighted that Mrs. Dole has accepted the challenge of leading this Department into the 1990's, and I urge all Senators to support this nomination.

Before I yield the floor, I would like to say just a word of thanks to the outgoing Secretary of Labor, Ann McLaughlin. It has been a privilege and a pleasure to work with her on labor and employment policy issues, including child care.

She has been open and responsive to all of our concerns here on the Hill and she has been straightforward in her approach to some of these very tough issues with which we have been involved. She was a great inspiration to 2,500 women in Utah last November when she delivered an informative and perceptive keynote address at my annual Utah Women's Conference.

Ann McLaughlin can be very proud of her service to the Reagan administration and proud that her shoes are being filled with a person the caliber of Elizabeth Dole. I wish her all the best and hope there will be another opportunity for us to work together soon.

Let me just say this: This department is important. There are a lot of very difficult issues. One of the things I have noted through the years is that there is such a delicate balance among the various competing groups, and particularly between management and labor in this country, that it is very difficult to make changes in the labor laws of this country. And that is as it should be, because those laws have been formulated, refined, and rerefined time after time to reach the status that we have today. Our system really does work.

I can tell you that there is a constant effort by those, at least on the left, to try and change these laws and to try and give one side of the equation more power, or more opportunity, or more benefits than the other. If we disturb this delicate balance, I think we are going to have more and more difficulty. There ae some very important laws on the books that we have to work on and that we have to continue to refine.

I do share our distinguished chairman of the committee's concerns about many of these issues. But it seems to me that one of the most important issues is child care. I am convinced Elizabeth Dole will help to bring about an effective child-care program in this country that will not have the Federal Government intruding into the homes of every family in this country, especially those families who might be directly or indirectly the beneficiaries of Federal funds.

I believe that this is not a time for us to make political statements, but it is a time for us to get behind this very fine woman and to help her to do this job.

I, for one, am pledging myself to do everything I can to help her and this new President as he takes over and addresses the tough issues in our society today.

With that, I just want to compliment Mrs. Dole again and tell her how much I admire her and respect her and support her for this position. I wish her well.

Mr. KENNEDY. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I would like to be associated with the commendation that my friend, the ranking minority member, made about Secretary McLaughlin.

I further understand that Secretary McLaughlin came out and made that presentation even after the Senator from Utah was reelected in November; am I correct in that?

Mr. HATCH. She did.

Mr. KENNEDY. So that is even a further indication of her good judgment and wisdom.

Mr. HATCH. I am sure she would have gone to Massachusetts had the Senator from Massachusetts needed help during the election.

I can tell you, to make a long story short, that she has been a very great Secretary of Labor in the short time she served. I have a great deal of respect for her, as my good colleague does as well.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time. I would like to yield some time to the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, how much time remains?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has 12 minutes remaining.

Mr. HATCH. How about the Senator from Utah?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah has 8 minutes remaining.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, as his nominee for Secretary of Labor, President Bush has named one of the most outstanding women—indeed, one of the most outstanding citizens—in America.

A native daughter of my home State of North Carolina—at least I should not say it is my home State. My home State is West Virginia, but it is the State in which I was born, the State whose motto is "To be rather than to seem."

A native daughter of North Carolina, Elizabeth Hanford Dole is a graduate of Duke University, from which she graduated in 1958, having served as president of its student body, and where she earned election to Phi Beta Kappa. From Duke, Mrs. Dole went to Cambridge, MA, where she earned a law degree from Harvard Law School, and a master's degree in education and government from Harvard University.

More recently, for nearly 4 years—longer than anyone to hold the position since its creation—Mrs. Dole served as the Secretary of Transportation. She was the eighth person in that position and the first woman to fill that role.

As Secretary of Transportation, Mrs. Dole oversaw a department of more than 100,000 employees, and was steward of a budget of approximately $26 billion annually.

Prior to joining President Reagan's Cabinet, Elizabeth Hanford Dole had served as Assistant to the President for Public Liaison at the White House. From 1973 until 1979, she had been a member of the Federal Trade Commission. Her public offices also include having been the Executive Director of the President's Committee on Consumer Interests, and Deputy Special Assistant to the President for Consumer Affairs.

Currently, Mrs. Dole serves as a member of the Board of Visitors for the Duke University School of Business, the honorary chairman of the board of overseers at the Duke University Comprehensive Cancer Center, and a member of the visiting committee of Harvard University's John F. Kennedy School of Government. She is also a recent recipient of the Humanitarian Award from the National Commission Against Drunk Driving. In addition, in 1988 Elizabeth Hanford Dole was named in the Gallup Poll as one of the world's 10 most admired women.

Mr. President, The Gallup pollsters did not contact me, but I will cast my vote for her right now as one of the world's 10 most admired women.

Need I say further that among her most important duties, Mrs. Dole herself also numbers being the wife and helpmate of our colleague, the distinguished minority leader, Senator ROBERT DOLE from Kansas.

On many, occasions in the past, I have had the pleasure of working with Mrs. Dole, and I always have found her perceptive, cooperative, responsible, concerned, knowledgeable, and gracious. I look forward to working with her in the future after her confirmation, in areas vital to the Nation and areas vital to West Virginia.

Mr. President, I am delighted by Mrs. Dole's nomination to become the Secretary of Labor, and I look forward to joining our colleagues in voting to confirm this exceptional choice.

I do not have any hankering to become majority leader again, even if other Senators were disposed to give me that choice, but I did say to Mrs. Dole when she called me on the telephone at home to tell me the President was going to nominate her for this office, I said, "Well, Elizabeth, the only reason I would like to be majority leader again, if I could be majority leader for 5 minutes, would be to have the privilege of calling up your nomination before the Senate."

I meant that. I unqualifiably support this nomination. I thank my colleagues, and I yield the floor.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished President pro tempore for his gracious remarks about a gracious lady, especially since he is North Carolinian and especially since she is the wife of my leader. Elizabeth is a great lady.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise in support of the nomination of Elizabeth Hanford Dole to be Secretary of Labor.

Mr. President, Mrs. Dole possesses excellent qualifications for the position of Secretary of Labor. A native of North Carolina, she graduated with distinction from Duke University, where she was president of the student body, and was elected to Phi Beta Kappa. She continued her studies at Harvard University, where she earned a masters degree, as well as a law degree, and made an outstanding record.

Mrs. Dole's career in public service began at the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, where she handled programs for the education of the handicapped. Under President Nixon, Mrs. Dole served as the Executive Director of the President's Committee on Consumer Interests, and she later became the Deputy Director of the White House Office of Consumer Affairs. Mrs. Dole has also been a member of the Federal Trade Commission, serving for 6 years.

Elizabeth Dole's remarkable ability to deal compassionately and effectively with people from all walks of life led to her being named as assistant to President Reagan for public liaison. In that position, she served with dedication and distinction as the President's goodwill ambassasdor to business, labor and other constituencies, with oftentimes diverse interests.

In 1983, Mrs. Dole became the eighth Secretary of Transportation of the United States. She was the longest serving Secretary of Transportation since the Department was created in 1967.

At the Department of Transportation, Mrs. Dole set policy direction for our Nation's aviation, highway, railroad, mass transit, and maritime resources. She also became the first woman to head a branch of the armed services, the U.S. Coast Guard. During Mrs. Dole's tenure, the Coast Guard played a leading role in our country's drug interdiction effort. Also, as Secretary of Transportation, Mrs. Dole accomplished major economic and safety reforms spanning all modes of transportation, as well as demonstated her effectiveness as an advocate of the Reagan administration's policies, which have led to the last 6 years of unprecedented economic expansion.

For 13 years, Elizabeth Dole has been the loving wife of our distinguished minority leader—and part of the time, majority leader—Senator ROBERT DOLE. If ever a task required a quick wit and engaging personality, that position does. All who have had the pleasure of knowing her, as have Mrs. Thurmond and I, will certainly agree that Mrs. Dole is one of the most able, dedicated, and attractive women in public service today.

Mr. President, Mrs. Dole has exhibited those traits of character and intellect which will serve her well as Secretary of Labor. I am certain that, in the post, as in all of the other positions that she has held, she will serve her country and her President with the utmost distinction, perseverance, and loyalty.

Accordingly, Mr. President, I strongly urge my colleagues to support the confirmation of her nomination.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I am pleased to rise in support in Elizabeth Hanford Dole as the next Secretary of Labor. She has an accomplished record of service: she has been the Deputy Director of the Office of Consumer Affairs; she has been the Commissioner of the Federal Trade Commission; more recently, she was Secretary of the Department of Transportation. She knows the ropes and she will do a great job, I hope, as the new Secretary of Labor.

Her new job may be her most challenging. The Department of Labor jurisdiction reaches into every aspect of working life. It includes job creation and training for those seeking work. It includes working conditions, employee benefits, and safety and health protections for those on the job. And it includes a retirement policy for those leaving work. The Department of Labor plays a key role in developing education, trade, and civil rights policy within the administration.

I am confident that Elizabeth Dole is up to the challenge. She has the qualities to be an outstanding Secretary. She is bright. She is hard-working. She is an activist who wants to make an impact. She is a pragmatist who can communicate with both management and labor.

She has already made strong efforts to build good relations with the Congress. I welcome such a relationship.

In passing, I should say, as the other two speakers before me have just indicated, that her predecessor certainly made every effort to cooperate with the Congress as well.

We have much to discuss, the new Secretary of Labor and those of us in the Congress concerned with labor issues. In particular, I am interested in increasing the participation of women in traditionally male-dominated jobs—in construction, aerospace, and other industries. Under Secretary McLaughlin, progress was made in opening the doors with respect to issues of importance in that area. But there is much more to be done.

I am concerned about workers safety and health issues: protecting employee whistleblowers who report health and safety violations; and advancing worker notification of occupational hazards. We must reexamine pension policies, policies where some corporations have seen fit to rip off billions of dollars to which the retirees have a rightful interest; pension reversions and the impact of leveraged buyouts on pension security are issues of prime importance to this Congress. I look forward to working with the new Secretary of Labor in these areas as well.

We must make an effort to reach a consensus on these issues. There is no question we are not going to be in total agreement as we start. But if people of good will have the inclination to bring about compromise to solve the problems, we can and will overcome those hurdles that stand in our way.

I believe Elizabeth Dole will make that effort. I urge all of my colleagues to join us in supporting her confirmation as Secretary of Labor.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I am happy to yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. SPECTER. I thank the distinguished ranking member.

Mr. President, I am pleased to express my support and vote for the confirmation of the Honorable Elizabeth Dole for the position of Secretary of Labor. I particularly commend President Bush for this appointment because he rose above the inevitable bruises of the primary campaign for the Republican nomination for President in selecting this very worthy public servant.

I have had the pleasure to know Elizabeth Dole for more than a decade professionally, politically and personally. My first contact with Mrs. Dole arose from my longstanding friendship of some 45 years with her husband, Senator BOB DOLE, our distinguished Republican leader. I knew BOB DOLE as a war hero when I was a high school student in Russell, KS.

In December 1980, after Senator DOLE's reelection and my first election, we and our wives were guests of honor at a reception at the Elks Club in Senator DOLE's lifelong hometown and my boyhood hometown, Russell, KS. That was the first occasion when I saw Elizabeth Dole at close range and observed her congeniality and charm.

Elizabeth Dole has an outstanding educational background, with a law degree from Harvard; perhaps her only lifelong error is not choosing the Yale Law School. That Harvard Law School degree was attained at a time when it was harder to be a woman student than to succeed in the Harvard paper chase.

She served with distinction as a White House assistant to President Reagan in the early days of his administration and then took on the challenging job of Secretary of Transportation in 1983. In those positions, and even before on the Federal Trade Commission, Mrs. Dole demonstrated brilliance, tenacity, and statesmanship, or perhaps more accurately stateswomanship.

She and I had significant differences on the Conrail issue; but, in the midst of our disagreements, she was not only never disagreeable but always cordial. She performed with unique competence and accomplishment in the important position of Secretary of Transportation.

I very much admired her action when she resigned her high position to campaign for her husband. When the Republican nominee was decided, she equally demonstrated that she was a total team player by her hard work and extensive travels in support of President Bush's successful campaign.

When the Doles and Specters were part of a congressional delegation to the Southwest Pacific this past November, I had an opportunity to talk at length with Elizabeth Dole about her current interests and aspirations. I again found her to be totally devoted to public service and in search of an opportunity to make the maximum contribution to the Nation.

I was delighted to hear the news bulletins on December 24 that the President had offered and she had accepted the prestigious position of Secretary of Labor. Her appointment was immediately applauded by labor and management and those inside and outside the beltway.

Her new position brings me only one possible regret. She had been considering joining a Senate Bible group under the tutelage of a distinguished biblical scholar, Mrs. Naomi Rosenblatt, which meets in my office each Wednesday at 5 p.m. With her new workload, it now seems doubtful that she will be able to join us; but perhaps she will find that the Old Testament has sage advice on the problems of labor and we can have her contribution there as well as in the important position of Secretary of Labor.

I thank the chair and Senator HATCH and yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. HATCH. I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Vermont.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. President, I am pleased to be able to address my first remarks in this body to the happy occasion of Elizabeth Dole's nomination to be Secretary of Labor.

I will keep my remarks brief, as her nomination is without controversy, and has been greeted with universal accolades. This is a rather rare phenomena for any nomination, but is especially so for the position which she is about to enter. It is perhaps the greatest tribute to her that is possible, one that I hope will continue at least through her appearance before the Labor Committee tomorrow afternoon.

The challenges before the Department of Labor and the Congress are tremendous. Mrs. Dole is fortunate in being able to build on the work of some very capable predecessors, Bill Brock and Ann McLaughlin. I was very pleased when she indicated that she will continue to focus on many of the issues that they had begun to address.

I was also very pleased that she has expressed a willingness to work with Congress to seek consensus solutions to the very knotty, problems before us. This consensus is critical. No one's long-term interest is served by turning these issues into political footballs; not the two parties, nor the administration, business or labor.

I look forward to working with Mrs. Dole. She has proven here competence, has demonstrated her commitment, and has earned our support. I urge my colleagues not just to support her nomination today, but to support her in her mission as Secretary of Labor.

I yield to the Senator from Utah.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I would just like to conclude by thanking my colleagues for coming to the floor and making these supportive statements.

I have been here 12 years, going into my 13th year, nothing like the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, but nevertheless have been intimately involved with the Department of Labor all during that time.

I do not know when we have had a time, since I have been here at least, when we have had a more open door, and the opportunity to do more good, than right now.

We have a President who has opened his arms to the Congress of the United States. He is a hands-on guy who basically, I think, is showing bipartisan spirit that has not been shown around here for years. We will have a new Secretary of Labor, hopefully, at the end of this vote, who in my opinion, really understands Government and what's going on in Washington. She can probably give BOB and the rest of us a few tips. We have a chance to do some very, very important things for this country.

I believe that Elizabeth Dole will go down in history as one of the truly great Secretaries of Labor. I look forward to working with her and helping her in every way I possibly can.

I am very proud to support this nomination, and I surely hope all of my colleagues will also.

I yield the remainder of my time to the distinguished Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I will take only a minute. I wanted to thank both the chairman of the committee and the ranking Republican member for their expeditious handling of this nomination. The fact that they were able to do it before the inaugural proceedings and have it on the floor today, in my view, is an indication of their willingness to cooperate. I am certain that they will receive the same cooperation from the nominee.

Mr. President, I believe I must hold a unique place in American history. Today, I stand before you, and for the second time ask that my Senate colleagues unanimously confirm the nominaton of my wife, Elizabeth, as a Cabinet Secretary.

And I must say, I do so without qualm or hesitation. Because, while I am undoubtedly favorably prejudiced toward the nominee, there is absolutely no question of her extraordinary qualifications for the job as Secretary of Labor.

It would take too long to read through her long list of credentials. Suffice it to say, that the combination of Elizabeth's educational background, her previous Government experience, and, most important, her unswerving commitment to better the lives of American men and women, makes her a natural for this position.

Public service is a phrase. But Elizabeth Hanford Dole brings that phrase to life. She has committed her time, her energies, her considerable abilities to being a force for progress and good in society. The many missions of the Department of Labor—ranging from job training to pensions—are missions I know that the new Secretary will tackle with sustained vigor, patience, and commitment.

I proudly urge my colleagues to ratify President Bush's choice for the Secretary of Labor by unanimously approving the nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I rise to speak on the nomination of Elizabeth Dole to be Secretary of Labor.

Mr. President, I am happy to express my enthusiastic support for the confirmation of Elizabeth Dole to be our new Secretary of Labor. She has a unique combination of abilities and experience that will enable her to be a very distinguished member of the President's Cabinet. She has served as a staff assistant at the Department of Health and Human Services, a member of the White House staff, Deputy Director of the U.S. Office of Consumer Affairs, a member of the Federal Trade Commission, and as Secretary of Transportation.

In all of these positions she has served with distinction. President George Bush chose well when he nominated her to be Secretary of Labor. Our new Secretary of Labor will be faced with many complex issues. American businesses and American workers are being confronted with complex challenges as well. These include a growing demand for worker benefits and greater education in job skill requirements. To deal effectively with these needs in the workplace, we must have a Secretary of Labor who can provide imaginative and strong leadership.

In my view no one is better suited for this tough and challenging job than Elizabeth Dole. She not only has a thorough knowledge of how this Government works but she also has the management skills and personal qualities that will be needed to bring together labor, business, and industry to help solve the problems we face.

As a member of the Committee on Labor and Human Resources I look forward to working with Secretary Dole to find ways to improve access of those on the lower end of the economic ladder to better training and education, and to give them the job skills that are necessary in today's labor force.

I congratulate President Bush on this nomination and express the hope that Elizabeth Dole will enjoy the greatest possible success and satisfaction in the performance of her duties as Secretary of Labor.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I rise to express my strong support for the nomination of Elizabeth Hanford Dole as Secretary of Labor. I believe that Mrs. Dole will bring to the Labor Department an outstanding wealth of political experience and a strong willingness to work in a bipartisan manner to resolve the many serious human resource issues confronting our Nation.

We all know that the United States has entered an unprecedented era of global trade competition. Until recent years, we Americans took it for granted that our Nation was by far the most economically powerful on Earth. But today we are the world's greatest debtor nation, and our economic prowess is not what it should be. We now understand that we must successfully compete with countries like Japan and West Germany in order to maintain our standard of living. In order to do so, we have finally begun to realize that we simply must do a better job to strengthen our labor productivity.

I am confident that Mrs. Dole will work with Congress to achieve consensus and to build bridges between business and labor as we strive to enhance the quality and flexibility of our work force. I urge my colleagues to vote in support of her nomination.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I rise in support of the nomination of Mrs. Dole as Secretary of Labor. I commend very heartily President Bush on his wise decision in choosing her as his nominee for Secretary of Labor.

I have had the opportunity, over the last several months, to work very closely with Mrs. Dole in her years that she served as Secretary of Transportation. But, more importantly, where you really get acquainted with people, I had an opportunity to work closely with her during the 1988 Presidential election cycle.

Mrs. Dole has spent much time meeting people in my State of Iowa, as well as people in many States around our country. She has a real understanding of the values and aspirations of the working men and women of this country. She appreciates the importance of encouraging positive labor-management relations and particularly as they in the next few years will work to further the longest peacetime economic expansion in U.S. history.

Mrs. Dole has the integrity, the determination, and the leadership ability to help overcome the many problems facing working Americans today.

I know that Mrs. Dole will meet the challenges ahead with the enthusiasm and commitment that is traditionally of Mrs. Dole in whatever she is involved with. I cannot think of a more deserving and appropriate nominee, and I wish Mrs. Dole much success in her position as the next Secretary of Labor.

I yield the floor.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I would first like to join my colleagues in expressing our profound admiration and confidence in Mrs. Dole as she once again takes on a major responsibility on behalf of the citizens of the United States.

I thought to myself as I listened to the remarks of my colleagues of what portion of her career in life that I might address that has not been addressed thus far. Perhaps it has, but I would like to mention that aspect of Mrs. Dole that I have come to admire so greatly. And that is the institution of the marriage that she has with ROBERT DOLE, our distinguished colleague and minority leader and how these two individuals—and, coincidentally, I live in a place here in Washington in which they also dwell so I see quite a bit of them.

Morning, noon, and night they are out pursuing their responsibilities on behalf of the citizens of this country. Indeed, the two of them—and particularly Mrs. Dole—provide an inspiration which is quite unique for so many young people who likewise aspire at some point in their career to contribute of themselves as public servants to the improvement of the welfare of our citizenry.

As I say they do so within the bounds of a marvelous institution of marriage and both God-fearing people strongly believing in religious freedom and pursuing their goals as laid down in the Great Book.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, it gives me great pleasure to rise today in support of the confirmation of Elizabeth Dole as Labor Secretary. Seldom have we had the opportunity to vote in confirmation of such a qualified and well-respected individual.

I have had the pleasure of knowing Elizabeth Dole for several years now. In this time I have always known her to be fair—yet tough, firm in her convictions—willing to listen to new ideas and initiatives, and at all times representative of the highest ideals that we can expect from our Government officials.

Mr. President, Elizabeth Dole has had a long and distinguished career in Government service. She started her career here in Washington in the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, and she has consistently applied herself to public service for more than 20 years. Most recently, Elizabeth Dole completed a distinguished tenure as this Nation's Secretary of Transportation. Elizabeth Dole's vast experience will serve her well in her new position at the Department of Labor.

In the weeks and months ahead, this Nation, and this body, will be confronted by many challenging issues in the area of labor and business relations. Foremost among these issues will be those of minimum wage, child care, parental leave and other mandated benefits. In order to address these, and other serious issues in a responsible and bipartisan manner, it is incumbent upon us to confirm an individual with the insight and experience in Government that Elizabeth Dole possesses.

Mr. President, I ask that this body unanimously support the confirmation of Elizabeth Dole to serve as Labor Secretary.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I strongly endorse President Bush's nomination of Elizabeth Hanford Dole to be the next Secretary of Labor. I urge my colleagues today to vote to confirm her nomination.

Elizabeth Dole has an exemplary record of public service. Her tenure in public office is representative of her dedication to and compassion for the welfare of our Nation. Her work in five administrations has given her a solid grasp of the intricacies and nuances of policymaking and the relationship between the legislative and executive branches. This knowledge will be most beneficial when she tackles the challenge of managing the Department of Labor.

To be successful, the next Secretary of Labor must be involved with the full range of economic, trade, education and family issues. The Secretary-designee proved that she has a solid grasp of the challenges ahead in her statement before the Labor Committee last week.

I had the opportunity to discuss with the Secretary-designee, at her confirmation hearing, the necessity of a Federal parental leave policy and a comprehensive child care initiative. With close to 61 percent of women with young children working, parents should not be forced to choose between their work and family. Affordable and good quality child care is essential. Parents should be able to take time off to care for a newborn, newly adopted or seriously ill child without jeopardizing their job.

Today, I have introduced the Act for Better Child Care—to set up a comprehensive program that creates a partnership between the Federal Government, State and local government, and the parents who are choosing the best option for their children. Next week I plan to reintroduce the Parental and Medical Leave Act. It is my hope that the Department and my office will work together to forge balanced legislation in both these areas to protect workers from having to choose between their jobs and their families.

As the new chairman of the Securities Subcommittee, I intend to work closely with the Department on the issue of pension funds. We need to examine the implications for pension funds in a securities market that is becoming an institutional market. It is estimated that pension funds will hold about half of all corporate stock by the year 2000. Our capital markets and, indeed, the way major corporations are governed in this country, are greatly influenced by the behavior of managers of pension fund money. The Department needs to take a close look at the influence that ERISA has on pension managers' decisions.

President Bush, some of my colleagues and I are each talking about ways to develop a domestic service program for our Nation's youth. Senator MITCHELL, today, announced that the development of a comprehensive voluntary service program would be a priority of the 101st Congress. It seems to me that the Department has an important role to play in protecting the rights of the volunteers, preventing displacement of adult workers, supporting a youth service that encourages education and training opportunities and recommending areas where youth volunteers might be of greatest service to their communities.

It is vital that Elizabeth Dole give special attention to improving the performance of the occupational safety and health administration as she promised during her confirmation hearing. While the agency recently promulgated regulations for hundreds of workplace hazards, more work remains to be done.

One particular area of interest I have is in OSHA's performance relating to the construction industry. Last year, I chaired a hearing which examined the enforcement of safety and health standards of OSHA, with a particular focus on the tragedy of the L'ambiance Plaza building collapse which occurred in my home State of Connecticut in 1987. For the past several months, my staff has been working on comprehensive legislation dealing with improving safety in the construction industry. We hope to introduce that legislation next month and look forward to the Department's feedback.

Before closing, I would like to draw attention to a key component of the decade-long debate over changes in the tort system with regard to product liability: the inadequacy of first party insurance. Inasmuch as more than half the economic losses are the result of workplace-related accidents, I think we need a better understanding of why these insurance systems are failing workers.

The Longshoreman and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act, which the Department of Labor administers, has an excellent reputation, far better than that of State worker compensation laws. The Department needs to assess how the Longshoreman's Act and the workers' compensation laws are working with respect to such issues as the adequacy and timeliness of benefits as well as the ability of the system to address occupational diseases. Armed with such information, the Congress and the administration would be in a better position to assess alternatives to the existing tort system, be it for product liability or for automobile accidents.

Elizabeth Dole is qualified to handle the various issues my colleagues and I have raised today and at the hearing. Once again, I encourage my colleagues to join me in supporting her nomination. In anticipation of her confirmation today, I wish Elizabeth Dole success and look forward to working with her.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I think we can assure the minority leader that we are going to have a positive vote. We have the votes on this side for this nominee. Just as long as you have them over there, it will be all right.

Mr. President, I understand that our time now has expired for the consideration of the nominee for the Secretary of Labor and, as I mentioned earlier, I would hope that all of our colleagues would vote favorable consideration to what I consider to be an outstanding nominee.

I yield back whatever time I have.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has 8 minutes remaining. Does he wish to yield back?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination will be temporarily laid aside.

OFFICE OF MANAGEMENT AND BUDGET

NOMINATION OF RICHARD G. DARMAN, OF VIRGINIA, TO BE DIRECTOR OF THE OFFICE OF MANAGEMENT AND BUDGET

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the next nomination.

The assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of Richard G. Darman, of Virginia, to be Director of the Office of Management and Budget.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, the time to be evenly divided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator would withhold. This nomination, under the order, has 1 hour for debate, equally divided; 30 minutes on a side to be controlled by Senator GLENN and Senator ROTH.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, the time to be evenly divided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the role.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, on behalf of the Governmental Affairs Committee, I am pleased to recommend to the full Senate for its approval the nomination of Mr. Richard Darman to be Director of the Office of Management and Budget, OMB.

Mr. President, I consider the OMB Director's post to literally be the second most powerful job in the U.S. Government. I am sure there would be other people in the departments who would say their jobs are very important, but outside of the power of the Presidency itself, I know of no office of Government where all the functions of Government come to a focal point as that area overseen by the Office of Management and Budget. That is where all of the different requests for money from different departments are put together. They are hacked at, they are considered and that office literally carries out the President's policies for the U.S. Government.

OMB has immense authority. Mr. Darman will certainly have a leading role in shaping national policy. As OMB Director, Mr. Darman will recommend where Federal dollars are spent and how hundreds of Government programs are managed. Mr. Darman will also review agency regulations pertaining to public health, worker safety and environmental protection. Mr. Darman will help determine not only what information the Government collects from the public, but much of the information the Government gives to the public.

The Committee on Governmental Affairs, which I chair, favorably reported Mr. Darman's nomination on January 23, following the completion of the committees' very thorough investigation and 2 days of hearings, including an extensive FBI report in which there was no derogatory material.

According to our committee rules and regulations, the ranking minority member, Senator ROTH, who is here on the floor with me, and I review that FBI report on behalf of the full committee. I would say Mr. Darman's report was exemplary, as far as I was concerned.

So Mr. Darman has met the committee's standards for personal integrity, professional competence and overall suitability for Presidential appointees.

During his confirmation hearings, Mr. Darman impressed me with his knowledge, his eloquence, his candor and also his wit. He will have to summon all of his considerable skills to tackle the Nation's No. 1 economic problem, the budget deficit, for it threatens not only our economic health but, indeed, our national security.

Quite frankly, I believe that this and the other challenges confronting Mr. Darman are the legacy of the flawed budgetary policies of the past administration, the Reagan administration. As a result of those policies, today we have a Federal debt approaching $3 trillion. That is "T" trillion dollars. It is growing at the rate of nearly $400 million a day. Each and every day we add $400 million to that debt. The United States now has the unenviable distinction of being the world's largest debtor nation, and our trade imbalances top $150 billion per year.

Clearly, we no longer reign unquestionably supreme in the world marketplace. Even more important, the woeful state of financial affairs here at home limit the resources we should be investing to strengthen our future productivity and economic viability. While we must currently pay off the interest due on our debts, future generations will have to pay off the principal. We are truly a nation living on borrowed time and borrowed money.

We are also faced with a host of urgent budget-busting problems: savings and loan crisis, deterioration of our nuclear weapons complex—we just had another 3½ hour hearing on that in our Government Affairs Committee—a shaky air transport system, housing and infrastructure maintenance, Federal prison construction, hazardous waste cleanup and DOD outyear outlays, better known as the bow waves because they all come due out here in a few years in one great big hump.

These serious matters demand our attention as quickly as possible. Delay only increases out costs which are currently pegged for the General Accounting Office to be more than $365 billion in unfunded liabilities. Mr. Darman clearly understands this problem, and he understands the policy dilemmas that await him. We discussed these during the hearings.

In responding to a wide variety of questions from the committee pertaining to budget and economic policy, U.S. international competitiveness and government management and regulation, Mr. Darman demonstrated savvy and drew upon his broad experience in government, in business and academia. I have no doubt whatsoever in Mr. Darman's qualifications and ability to get a handle on the budget problem. In fact, not too many people in either party are as well-suited as Mr. Darman to grapple with it.

What policies will come out yet we do not know, of course. His background indicates he is well qualified to consider matters of this magnitude. There is no question in my mind Mr. Darman will just know how to use OMB's extensive power and authority. So I believe that he has the potential, with his training and background and experience, to be perhaps the most effective OMB Director that we have had in a long time.

Having said this, what I will reserve judgment on is how President Bush, through Mr. Darman, intends to solve our budgetary crisis. In our 2 days of hearings, very few details were offered by Mr. Darman to show us the direction the President is headed. There are few hints on how he is going to pay for our needs, what amounts will be spent, where cuts are going to be made and how the Gramm-Rudman deficit reduction targets will be met.

We still do not know very much about how President Bush's flexible freeze plan will actually be implemented. So in my judgment I do not place great stock in our ability to meet the Gramm-Rudman target simply by growing out of the deficit. The economic signposts just do not support this information.

We are treading in very dangerous waters and I, like very many of my colleagues, hope to receive some indication of where we are going when President Bush submits his own budget plan to us in just a few days, next month. It is my hope we will witness bipartisan cooperation between the executive and legislative branches in arriving at a responsible and a legitimate solution.

Just a couple personal comments in closing. Mr. Darman is somewhat of an anacronism among his colleagues and business school peers. He has devoted most of his adult life to public service. In fact, he has experience in six Federal agencies, much to his credit. Mr. Darman's ethical and professional conduct throughout his Government service has been exemplary. He has never to my knowledge sought private gain at the expense of the public trust. Shortly after his OMB appointment was announced, Mr. Darman established blind trust arrangements and voluntary recusal agreements to protect him against any perception of potential conflicts of interest, and on those recusal agreements he has pledged he will notify us as a Congress any time any one of those recusal agreements would have to be exercised.

I would like to see other incoming nominees follow Mr. Darman's lead in this regard.

In short, Mr. Darman seems to have an old-fashioned view of Government service which I find refreshing and for which he deserves this body's recognition. I offer him my congratulations and I look forward to working with him on the great issues and challenges facing us.

Our vote in committee was unanimous. Out of our 14-member committee, there were 11 votes for him, two votes by proxy later in the day, and one person did not vote but that was not, as I understand, because they were against Mr. Darman; it was just that they did not get their proxy statement in by the 5 o'clock committee deadline. So in effect this was a unanimous report of the Governmental Affairs Committee.

Mr. President, it is my understanding that this is a 1-hour time limit with a vote certain to occur at 5:30; is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct. The Senator has 19 minutes remaining.

Mr. GLENN. We may have some other people who wish to speak and this time division was down the middle of the aisle, not on the issue itself of Mr. Darman. It was just divided on the Democrat and Republican side. It was not divided on a pro and con basis.

I see my colleague is waiting to speak, so I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware is recognized.

The Senator has 28 minutes.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I rise today to express support for the nomination of Richard Darman as the Director of the Office of Management and Budget. President Bush has expressed his utmost confidence in the ability of Mr. Darman to serve in this critical position. I concur in the President's choice, and urge my colleagues to do the same.

Three days ago, on Monday, the Committee on Governmental Affairs unanimously approved Mr. Darman's nomination. I applaud the committee's prompt action on this nomination and Mr. Darman's thoroughness and responsiveness throughout the process, including 2 days of committee hearings.

During 2 days of testimony, Mr. Darman proved his familiarity with the issues confronting the Director of OMB. He reaffirmed the administration's strong desire to reduce the Federal deficit and reiterated President Bush's tough stand against new taxes. Equally important, Mr. Darman expressed the need to keep the economy growing, to increase private savings and investment, and to increase productivity.

Mr. Darman has an outstanding record of public service in a wide array of positions. In 1971, he served as a special assistant to the Secretary and a Deputy Assistant Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. He later served in the Departments of Defense, Justice, and Commerce.

In 1980, he joined the incoming Reagan administration and worked for 4 years as an assistant to the President and Deputy to the Chief of Staff. In 1985, Mr. Darman was nominated by President Reagan to be the Deputy Secretary of Treasury, and was confirmed by the Senate for that position unanimously. Throughout this time, he has gained broad experience in Government—experience which will be a tremendous asset to the new administration.

The Director of OMB is, as the Chairman pointed out in his very elloquent statement, one of the most important and demanding positions in the Federal Government. As a key advisor to the President, the Director of OMB is in a position to greatly influence the successful development of national policy and the effective management of Government programs. I have the utmost confidence that Mr. Darman will serve in this position with distinction and support him enthusiastically.

Many issues were raised during the committee's 2 days of testimony, but perhaps the most important dealt with the Nation's ability to compete in the global marketplace. At a time when the global economy requires us to compete with dynamic and rising countries like some in Europe and on the rim of Asia, it is very important that the purpose of our economic policy remain economic growth. And to continue economic growth, we must improve private savings and investment. Mr. Darman understands this, and repeatedly stressed it in answers to the committee's questions. His emphasis on the need for long-term strategies to address the Nation's needs and improve the national savings rate and investment is very important.

The United States is currently in its 74th month of the longest peacetime expansion in this Nation's history—with more than 19 million new jobs created under the watch of President Reagan and Vice President Bush. Richard Darman understands that we must continue this economic recovery if we are to have any hope of reducing the Federal deficit. During the Presidential campaign, George Bush promised "no new taxes." Richard Darman knows this. Throughout the 2 days of confirmation hearings, he reaffirmed his, and the President's, tough stand against new taxes.

I am very confident of what Mr. Darman can—and will—do. As a proven public servant, with an ability to develop legislative strategy to address the Nation's strongest challenges, Mr. Darman has the opportunity and ability to implement the promise of the Bush administration and he understands the importance of continuing this recordbreaking economic recovery.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to support the nomination of Mr. Richard Darman. President Bush has demonstrated his confidence in Mr. Darman's expertise and background, and I believe the public is well served by having an individual with his talents dedicated to Government service.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, while ranking Cabinet officers in order of importance is an impossible task—and certainly not one I personally want to engage in—I think it is fair to say that at least at the outset of the Bush administration, the Director of Management and Budget is the man seated in what could be called either the catbird seat or the hot seat.

His mission right now, to guide the drafting of the 1990 budget, is critical—not only to the fate of our domestic economy, but the world economy. The decisions made during the budget deliberations will also dictate how and what Government will do over the coming year.

In other words, Richard G. Darman, President Bush's choice for Budget Director, has one big job ahead of him. But, I have no doubt that if anyone can handle it, Dick Darman can.

Dick has held positions in the biggest departments in Government—HEW, Defense, and Treasury. So his knowledge of the bureaucracy is considerable. And his special background in economic issues most recently in the private sector, and as Deputy Treasury Secretary during a time when the budget was also a major concern, provides him with very essential and useful experience.

Mr. President, the successful Budget Director must be the master of many trades. He must understand Government, know the way the bureaucracy functions as well as the significance of given Federal programs. He must understand the economy, how Wall Street and Tokyo and London, react. He must understand Congress, plus the needs of State and local governments as well. He must understand how the Washington system works. And finally, he must understand and have the confidence of the man he works for, the President of the United States. Richard Darman understands and does. And so I urge my colleagues to unanimously confirm his nomination today.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise in support of the nomination of Richard G. Darman, who has been selected by President Bush to serve as Director of the Office of Management and Budget [OMB].

Having broad public and private sector experience, Mr. Darman is well-qualified for the position of Director of OMB. In the public sector, Mr. Darman served very ably as Deputy Secretary of the Treasury. In that position he was a key negotiator of the comprehensive tax reform legislation enacted in 1986. Prior to assuming his position as Deputy Secretary, he served in the Reagan White House as Assistant to the President and Deputy to the Chief of Staff. While serving in this capacity, he was instrumental in helping to negotiate the budget and tax acts of 1981, the tax reform legislation of 1982, and the Social Security compromise of 1983.

In addition to his service in the Reagan White House, Mr. Darman served during the Ford administration as Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Policy.

His private sector experience is equally impressive. Most recently, from April 1987 until November 1988, he served as managing director in the Investment Banking Group of Shearson Lehman Hutton. Additionally, Mr. Darman has been a fellow of the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars, a principal and director of ICF Inc., a member of the faculty of the Harvard Graduate School of Government, a trustee of the Brookings Institution, and a contributing editor of U.S. News and World Report.

Mr. President, this impressive list of qualifications speaks well for him, and reinforces the 9-to-0 vote of the Governmental Affairs Committee to send his name to the full Senate.

I urge my colleagues to unanimously approve this very able nominee.

Mr. President, I wish to again thank the distinguished chairman of the committee and thank the able Senator from North Carolina for their consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I yield time to the distinguished Senator from Michigan who would like to be recognized, and I yield such time as he may require.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. LEVIN. I thank the Chair, and my friend from Ohio.

THE NOMINATION OF RICHARD G. DARMAN TO BE THE DIRECTOR OF THE OFFICE OF MANAGEMENT AND BUDGET

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, one of the most important decisions which the Senate will make early in this session of the Congress is whether to confirm the nomination of Richard Darman as the new Director of the Office of Management and Budget. Both the history of the past 8 years and the prospects for the next 4 highlight the pitfalls and the promise that are inherent in the position of OMB Director.

We have had the bitter experience, in 1981 and 1982 especially, of being deceived by OMB Director, David Stockman. If we had any concerns at that time, and many of us did, they were bluntly confirmed when Mr. Stockman subsequently wrote:

> Yet since no one in the White House wanted to propose the first triple-digit budget deficit in history, I finally did what the Atlantic story seemed to accuse me of. I out-and-out cooked the books, inventing $15 billion per year of utterly phony cuts in order to get Ronald Reagan's first full budget below the $100 billion deficit level.

This postmortem openness was helpful, but the stakes are too high and the position of OMB Director too crucial for us to settle for after-the-fact honesty. If we are to address the budget deficit problem credibly and effectively, then we must be able to depend on straight talk now from the OMB Director. This is particularly true in light of the preeminent position that the Gramm-Rudman law gives to the economic assumptions and deficit projections of the OMB. To build deficit reduction plans on fantasy serves no one's advantage in the long term.

And it is the long-term economic health of the United States, the long-term quality of life of its citizens, and the long-term security of its position in the world that offers the new OMB Director a positive challenge. Through his recommendations on what programs should be cut and what programs should be increased, he will be making more than an arithmetic judgment. He will be making a judgment that will affect the quantity and quality of jobs here at home and our ability to compete and protect ourselves abroad. He will be working with people in the administration and in the Congress today, but the results of their mutual efforts will affect the lives of generations to come. It is an awesome responsibility.

On a specific point, much of the time of the confirmation hearings was devoted to fleshing out President Bush's promise not to support any tax increase or any new tax. According to Mr. Darman's, and I assume the President's dictionary, it seems to come down to this: First, they are using the term "tax increase" synonymously with the term "new tax." Second, a proposal to raise revenues in a way that most Americans would view as a tax increase is by definition also a tax increase. A tax increase does not by that definition include current revenue increases which result from previously enacted legislation. It also does not include legislation which has been previously proposed by the Reagan-Bush administration and from which President Bush has not disassociated himself; nor, does it include a delay in a previously scheduled tax reduction. Finally, President Bush's no tax pledge will be in effect for some extended and indefinite period of time and perhaps forever, according to Mr. Darman.

Based on past experience, the American people have every right to be skeptical about how forthrightly any tax increase will be advertised. And, Mr. Daman's own definition itself is not without some ambiguity. However, by and large it appears to be a sincere attempt to lay out the parameters of President Bush's no tax increase pledge. The months and years ahead will indicate how wise or realistic it was for the President to make this pledge. But for the moment, this willingness to be clear is a hopeful beginning to Mr. Darman's tenure as Director of the Office of Management and Budget.

Mr. Darman's background has prepared him well for his new position. He has the potential for being a very good Director of OMB if he is straight with the President, straight with the Congress and, most important of all, straight with the American people. We wish him and the administration well on that venture.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, how much time remains on each side of the aisle?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio has 13 minutes and 9 seconds; the Senator from Delaware has 21 minutes and 22 seconds.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I rise today to support President Bush's nomination of Richard G. Darman as Director of the Office of Management and Budget. On Monday the Governmental Affairs Committee gave its endorsement of Mr. Darman when it voted unanimously to send his nomination to the full Senate.

Mr. Darman's nomination comes at a crucial time of tight budgets and tough decisions. He literally will be on the frontline of an uphill battle to reduce the mounting Federal deficit. It will be a balancing act between limited dollars and demanding programs. None of this will be easy. It will take dedication to make this work. Mr. Darman has given every indication he has that dedication.

First, he understands that the administration and Congress must work together to bring the budget deficits under control. Mr. Darman's call for early meetings with Congress sends the proper signal to the American people. He also has extensive experience in the executive branch of our Government. This kind of foundation will be a tremendous asset to the process ahead of us.

Second, Mr. Darman brings a strong sense of ethical responsibility to the position. Over the years, a certain amount of cynicism has developed as a result of the politicizing of OMB by past Directors. I was pleased to learn of Mr. Darman's pledge to be candid and forthcoming with Congress.

Last, I took particular interest in his testimony regarding a 2-year budget. His support for the theory is combined with a healthy skepticism about its implementation. This shows a depth of understanding that is refreshing. He noted that a 2-year budget process can produce inaccurate projections and could result in government by supplemental.

I look forward to working with Mr. Darman and the administration in the months ahead. I know we possess the tools, and I feel confident that Congress possesses the will to do its part in solving our Nation's economic crisis. Rarely in our history has there been a more critical need for cooperation between the executive and Congress. The future of our children and grandchildren depends on us.

Ultimately the quality of a government depends upon the quality of the poeple who serve in critical positions. I am confident that Richard Darman has the skills to fill his challenging role in the new administration.

Mr. CONRAD. Mr. President, I rise today to support the nomination of Richard G. Darman as Director of the Office of Management and Budget. He has significant experience with the Federal budget, and brings exceptional management skills to this post. His experience will be needed as we struggle to lead the Nation out of its fiscal morass.

In the last of 8 years, the national debt has tripled; the trade deficit has multiplied sixfold; and the United States has gone from the world's largest creditor Nation to the world's largest debtor Nation; our national savings rate has been cut in half. This combination of circumstances threatens our economic security.

It's clear that new and bold steps are necessary. We must have a change in economic policy. Mr. Darman's intimate knowledge of the problems and the process will be useful in the months and years ahead, as we address our fiscal needs and work to reduce the deficit.

And make no mistake, we must reduce the deficit if we are to preserve our economic health. The annual deficit has come down a bit since the 1986 level of $221.2 billion. Through asset sales, one-time savings, and by hiding the operating deficit behind trust funds, we have reduced the deficit to the $150 to $155 billion level. But there we sit, stagnating.

If we strip away the off-budget trust funds, the deficit continues to grow from the 1987 level of $222 to $239 billion by 1994. Clearly, debt continues to accumulate at record rates. We must begin making the tough decisions necessary to reduce the deficit.

There is a will to act on the deficit in Congress—but we must set our sights higher. Our task is urgent, and difficult. We must achieve real deficit reduction, preserve the Nation's competitiveness, and spur future economic growth. But in our attention to numbers, we cannot neglect the human side of the budget. We must focus attention on the people who have been neglected under current policy, and preserve the programs they need—education, health, nutrition, research and development.

And I know we can find the money to pay for the programs we need. We can collect taxes from those who are not paying their fair share. The gap between the taxes rightfully owed to the Federal Government and what is actually paid stands at $85 billion a year. That gap will grow to $110 billion per year by 1992. Much of that revenue can be collected. According to a study released by the California Institute of Technology last year, Federal revenues would have been $47 billion higher in 1985 if the IRS had maintained the same audit rates that it had in 1977.

There is another area of the budget where significant savings can be achieved. It's high time our allies in western Europe and Japan begin paying their fair share of our joint defense burden. The United States is paying some $150 billion a year to defend Western Europe and Japan. Meanwhile, we are borrowing billions from those same countries to finance our own massive debt. We will never forget our obligations to our allies. But Japan and western Europe enjoy robust economic health. They can pay more and they should.

It was encouraging to see our new President sit down with congressional leaders, and open the door to continuing negotiations with Capitol Hill. Deficit reduction is the most challenging and the most critical issue we face. I urge the President and Mr. Darman to continue this spirit of cooperation, and hope that together we can make real progress.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum with the time to be divided equally on both sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is agreed to, and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I am happy to yield to the distinguished minority whip such time as he may need.

NOMINATION OF JAMES A. BAKER III

Mr. SIMPSON. I thank the Senator from Delaware, and I thank the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. President, I will just take a moment to speak on the nominations before us, and in no particular order. But I do want to express my support and admiration for Jim Baker as Secretary of State. He has had an absolutely distinguished career of public service, and he is certainly extremely well qualified for this task he is about to assume.

We all know this remarkable record of his. We have come to know him and understand his remarkable prowess. All of us on both sides of the aisle have seen him serve President Reagan as chief of staff, and serve on the National Security Council, and as chair of the President's Economic Policy Council. He also served ably as the 67th Secretary of the Treasury. That is an interesting statistic. I think that is the second greatest turnover in a Cabinet post position. I believe the largest turnover is in the role of Secretary of the Interior, which is always assuredly a difficult one, since the statutes say they are to preserve and protect and then also to develop and administer multiple use of public lands. Nevertheless, he served as the 67th Secretary, and then he left to chair the successful Presidential campaign of George Bush.

This is not a partisan commentary, but certainly his presence in the campaign after the convention in August gave extraordinary power and strength to that effort.

So he is now to serve us as Secretary of State. He is a lawyer, a tough, savvy ex-marine—and those are a special breed, as we know. He is an accomplished diplomat and a public servant. I wish to express that I am so very pleased.

He is splendid to work with and splendid to counsel with, to break bread with, a tough, savvy, articulate man, and loyal, loyal, loyal. He is a very trusted friend of our fine President, with a staying power that is evident to us all—and with a very fine whiz of a mind that will be good for the President, but, more important, so good for this country.

My wife Ann and myself wish him and his lovely wife, Susan, every success as they undertake this unique new responsibility.

NOMINATION OF ELIZABETH HANFORD DOLE

Mr. President, with regard to the nomination of Elizabeth Hanford Dole, I am very pleased to speak a few words in her behalf, in support of the nomination of this truly remarkable lady.

She has devoted a large part of her life to public service, and she has done a most extraordinary job.

Most recently, she has ably served our former President as Secretary of Transportation, and she now brings these very considerable talents—and a penchant for extremely hard work—to the post of Secretary of Labor. Although she assumes this post at a time of some excellent statistics on the national scene, figure's showing high employment and economic growth, what has been interesting to me is that she has already shown that she looks beyond the usual rosy economic pictures with which we are often presented in government, to search out solutions for those who are not yet touched or aided or who are not brought along with the rest in what is described as good economic times.

In her statement during her confirmation hearing, she stated that the Department of Labor would have five objectives. Those include addressing the issues of concern to workers with families, developing training programs for the skilled or those who must gain new skills, ensuring that the American workplace is safe, and securing direct labor-management relationships toward being more productive and positive, which I think is so critical.

As the majority leader said this morning in his very powerful remarks, and as the President yesterday spoke of the spirit of cooperation and bipartisanship, and that is something I deeply believe in; certainly it is also something to fully pursue with regard to management and labor in the United States. I do think that this is a noble goal for this Secretary of Labor.

She also spoke of developing a comprehensive pension policy to bring a measure of rationality to the demographic and social changes that are upon us.

So here will be a Secretary of Labor who looks to the future and toward the ensuring of jobs and job training, and I am certainly looking forward to working with her.

Let me add a personal note. In my duties as assistant leader of our party in the Senate, it is often a happy occasion, for my wife and me to share many events with our friends the former majority leader, the present minority leader, Senator DOLE, and Elizabeth Dole. In those times we have had that opportunity on many occasions to be together at these events, I have found her to be a most special lady, of great charm and great grace, a woman of substance and high intellectual ability and quality.

I think there is also another side to her. Those of us who heard her at the national prayer breakfast a couple of years ago were absolutely thrilled to observe again the wholeness of this remarkable lady. A beautiful lady she is, inside and out. She will be a very proud addition to this Cabinet and will grace the Cabinet not just with her physical presence but also with her intellectual capabilities, which are indeed superb.

NOMINATION OF RICHARD DARMAN

Mr. President, a word about Richard Darman. When George Bush tapped Richard Darman to become the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, I do not believe there was anyone in Washington who has been observing the scene for long who might have said: "Well now, who is that?"—because we all have come to know Dick Darman, and have come to respect greatly his rich qualities and his skills.

Each task that he has undertaken in public life has demonstrated his ability to seek compromise, to be accessible, to reach results. In no job will those skills be more needed than from the man who will come to be known as the Bush administration's "budget guy", or the "chap from OMB," and other phrases which will be slightly less tasteful.

As it happens in this particular line of work, it is a very tough job, but he will give the sharp eagle eye to what needs to be done. He will work well with the congressional committees.

I watched the proceedings conducted by Senator GLENN as Mr. Darman presented his position on this issue, as we look for chinks in the armor of overlaid deficit of where we go with regard to this deficit, how we do it—and we have to do it—and where we are with the Presidential campaign platforms and the statements that were made?

Yes, I think the Federal budget deficit is one of the most pressing issues we face as a Nation and those in Congress, those of us here, are the ones who cast the votes. You know you can haggle all you want on that one and we can throw darts down Pennsylvania Avenue at Jimmy Carter or Gerald Ford or John Kennedy or Dick Nixon or Ronald Reagan, but the issue is so clear that we in the Congress cast the votes on the budget, and Richard Darman will be working with us as we grapple with that deficit.

The Nation is very fortunate that he has accepted this tough task. It is a tough one indeed. I have sat through various budget negotiations in the past, and I know that Dick Darman will need to use every single ounce of patience, determination, and his rare skills and all of the resolve within his being to accomplish this result. He signed on for a job that really does truly call for heavy lifting.

So I trust that the various words of praise we have heard today for him will simply not go aglimmering once we get into the heavy work of reducing the deficit. I am convinced he will work with us in good faith.

I hope and pray the Congress will give him and President Bush the good faith cooperation the Nation so desperately needs for this task at this moment.

I know the President and Dick Darman have already been at work on the budget proposals to be submitted to Congress next month; and as we confirm him today we do so with the knowledge that he is a superbly qualified person for this new role and indeed he has also hit the ground running.

BOYD HOLLINGSWORTH

Senator Dole this morning spoke briefly of Boyd Hollingsworth who is my counsel here and who served me as counsel while I carried out the duties of assistant leader of our Republican Party. And so it is indeed with very mixed emotions that I speak and say just a word if I may for 3 minutes, would that be appropriate, to those who manage the time on this side of the aisle?

Mr. GLENN. Take 3 off our side over here. I yield 3 minutes.

Mr. SIMPSON. Boyd Hollingsworth will now become the Senate liaison with the White House, an extraordinary and important job, one that Pam Turner has served in so ably in the past.

I am losing an extraordinary, it is improper to call him a staffer, for I lose a friend. A young man who worked his way through law school at the University of Wyoming, who had a coffee for me when I was running for this job in 1978, whose wife Deena who was the daughter of a dear fellow I played basketball with at the University of Wyoming—and that goes way back. So it is with such mixed emotions as I watch this fine young man move on with his skills, ability, and dedication. He has been the very source of my Senate activities. We all hear the old saw here that whatever degree of success we see in ourselves is often the result of having dedicated staff and benefitting by their hard work and Boyd Hollingsworth is a superb and prime example of that, a man who has served in my name—and they do—and he will now go on to serve in our fine President's name.

So, I just hate to lose him. I mean that. That is the word I want to use. We have shared many late nights together on this floor. We have shared counsel. We have shared much in the name of not just professional activities but of friendship. So I wish him well. He is one of those members of the small, unique, and dedicated group of people who really make this U.S. Senate work, who keep the train on the track and the engine humming, even though it does cough from time to time with notable regularity. But I say he was a true expert at his craft.

I owe much to him and to his very supportive wife, Deena, and his two children, Melissa and Robert, and hopefully they will see something of him as he now disappears into the great maw between 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue and the U.S. Capitol—but he will be here with us in a new role being just as instructive and just as helpful and cooperative. And so I wish my friend Boyd Hollingsworth well in an extraordinary new adventure in his own life and thank him for so enlightening my activities in this remarkable arena which we all love so well.

I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I want to very briefly speak about the nominees who are before us and I say to my colleague——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Minnesota yield for 1 minute? We will ascertain who yields time.

Mr. ROTH. How much time does the Senator require?

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Three minutes.

Mr. ROTH. How much time remains?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Three minutes and nine seconds.

Mr. GLENN. I yield 3 minutes off our side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota is recognized for 3 minutes.

NOMINATIONS OF BAKER, DARMAN, AND DOLE

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. I thank the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. President, I will speak briefly about the three nominees before us, Jim Baker at the State Department, Dick Darman at OMB, and Elizabeth Dole at the Labor Department.

I have known Jim Baker now for a decade, and it has been a relationship that I am very proud of. He already has made an extraordinary contribution to our country and comes as well prepared as any Secretary of State within my memory. I know I read in the paper that he will have to rely on the professionals, because he does not have foreign relations experience. On the contrary, I know of few who have come to this position with more. Jim Baker was at the right hand of the President for 4 years, involved in every aspect of national and international policy. By practically unanimous acclaim, he did an extraordinary job.

Furthermore, we know him as an individual who is shrewd, adroit, and intelligent, qualities he demonstrated during the course of the hearings.

He comes, Mr. President, to his post at State at a time when we have made remarkable strides. Peace is bursting out in many parts of the world. In this entire decade, the only decade in my life of which this can be said, not a single square foot of the Earth's surface has fallen to a dictator, either on the right or on the left. This has indeed been a remarkable decade.

So I look forward to working with Jim Baker as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee. I think that, indeed, he does come prepared. I believe that his time in office will be fruitful.

Dick Darman is also an old friend, and I noticed in Time magazine that Dick Darman has to go to meetings by himself. Allegedly, he couldn't find staff. In my experience with Dick Darman, he has always eschewed staff in our meetings. Frankly, I found that refreshing. Because he did not come with a huge retinue. The meeting would only take 10 or 15 minutes, not 25, 35, or 40 minutes.

We came to conclusions quickly and I always found him extremely well prepared. He didn't need staff because he knew enough himself. I look forward to having an excellent relationship with the new Director of OMB, and I think the Nation will profit from his service in this position. He is a man of ideas and has very broad knowledge.

Of course, all of us know Elizabeth Dole. When she was Secretary of Transportation, she was one of the most accessible, one of the most action-oriented members of the Cabinet. So she will be again, as Secretary of Labor. She is an extraordinarily articulate women. She is extraordinarily well organized, and always gets things done.

Mr. President, I believe that the people who are before us today are people who are going to serve this Nation well and be a credit to it.

I yield the floor.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I rise today to express my support for the confirmation of Mr. Richard Darman to be Director of the Office of Management and Budget.

Mr. Darman is an experienced and capable public servant. He has served under three Presidents with great distinction, in the Justice Department, the Commerce Department, the Treasury Department, and the White House. He has been an able and skilled negotiator in many of the most far-reaching pieces of legislation enacted in the past several years, particularly the Social Security Amendments of 1983 and the Budget Summit of 1987.

Mr. Darman also brings superb academic credentials to his position, having graduated from Harvard College and Harvard Business School. He has also served with distinction as a member of the board of trustees of the Brookings Institution, and with the Woodrow Wilson Center at the Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. President, with the inauguration now behind us, it is time for the new administration and the Congress to forge ahead on pressing matters of state. And, Mr. President, the most important matter of state is reducing the Federal budget deficit.

President Bush in his inaugural address called for a "new engagement" between the executive branch and the Congress. He called for a renewal of bipartisanship and a new spirit of compromise and harmony as we tackle such problems as reduction of the Federal budget deficit.

I welcome this call for bipartisanship and I trust that Mr. Darman will serve the President well in this regard as we seek to put our fiscal house in order.

Mr. President, since 1981, the Reagan administration has never—not once—presented to the Congress a balanced budget or a budget which was grounded on very realistic economic assumptions. Through the years, the budget process became a game of one upmanship, with the administration and the Congress locked in a very divisive political gridlock. This has not served the country well.

It was only a near catastrophe on Wall Street in October of 1987—when the stock market dropped by 500 points in a single day—that the Reagan administration seemed willing to forge a bipartisan budget agreement. Consequently, the Congress and the administration reached a consensus that provided for a sound and equitable means of curbing the budget deficit.

But, of course, the job of building a new fiscal policy for the Nation is not yet done. We must take action to bring the budget into balance by 1993, and we must develop a budget policy that squarely faces up to the fiscal challenges before us.

In one of his first messages to the Congress, President John F. Kennedy said that—

> * * * Apart from any threat to national security the Federal budget should * * * be in balance over the years of the business cycle, running a deficit in years of recession when revenues decline and the economy needs the stimulus of additional expenditures, and running a surplus in years of prosperity, thus curbing inflation, reducing the public debt, and freeing funds for private investment.

Mr. President, that was an excellent prescription for fiscal policy in 1961. It is an excellent prescription for fiscal policy today—one that President Bush and Mr. Darman would do well to follow.

Mr. President, there are a few aspects of Mr. Darman's testimony before the Senate Government Affairs Committee that I would like to touch on.

Mr. Darman promised the committee that President Bush would shortly be sending up comprehensive revisions to President Reagan's 1990 budget. I welcome this commitment.

The 1990 Reagan budget is seriously flawed. It is based on rosy economic assumptions that understate the budget deficit by at least $14 billion.

It ignores the major costs of other pressing problems facing the Nation such as the clean up of the Department of Energy's nuclear plants and restoring the health of our savings and loan system. It also continues the outmoded spending priorities of the past several years, making major reductions in education programs, Medicare and Medicaid, and even programs for the homeless.

We need a new budget from President Bush that will clearly express his fiscal priorities. When Mr. Darman transmits this new budget to the Congress, we can begin to fashion a bipartisan budget resolution.

Mr. Darman also suggested in his testimony that a sequester was a silly way to budget. I could not agree with him more. We do not need to budget by a Gramm-Rudman-Hollings sequester.

By April 1, the Senate Budget Committee must report a budget to the floor. By April 15, a budget resolution must be passed by both Houses of Congress.

We can meet this schedule with the cooperation of the administration. But if the administration does not seek bipartisan cooperation, they could very well be headed down the road of a budget sequester. So I take Mr. Darman at his word when he says that a sequester is simply a bad way to set the budgetary policy of this country.

Finally, I commend Mr. Darman for his commitment to work with the Congress, in a bipartisan way, on resolving the problems of the deficit.

The Senate and House Budget Committees stand ready to tackle the budget crisis head on.

Both budget committees have already begun their hearings on the 1990 budget. I and my ranking minority member, Mr. DOMENICI, are committed to extensive hearings in the weeks ahead as we prepare to markup of the 1990 budget resolution. Democratic and Republican members of the committee will work together in constructing a bipartisan budget resolution if we have the cooperation of the administration in making the regular budget process work. So once again, I am heartened by Mr. Darman's commitment to a bipartisan budget process.

I look forward to the budget that Mr. Darman will bring forth to the Congress. I appreciate his willingness to do the work necessary to avoid budgeting by sequester and I trust that he will exhibit a genuine and enduring commitment to a bipartisan budget policy that will serve this country well as we seek to put our fiscal house in order and restore our ability to compete in the global marketplace in the years ahead.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I rise to express my support for Richard Darman to be the new Director of the Office of Management and Budget. Mr. Darman is a bright, energetic individual who has wide experience in fiscal affairs. As chief aide to James Baker during the latter's tenure as Treasury Secretary, Mr. Darman learned how government works from a true professional. As a member of the Finance Committee, I had the privilege of working with him on many matters, not the least being the Tax Reform Act of 1986.

A colleague of mine recently stated that the position of OMB Director is the second most important post in government. Not many would debate this assertion. OMB's authority runs laterally across every Federal agency, from the Department of Defense to the Small Business Administration. As such, its power is immense. But with that power must go a commensurate sense of responsibility. While the nature of the job is such that the Director has to see the larger economic and fiscal picture, he also has a responsibility to understand the human impact of OMB's decisions. In my opinion, not every OMB Director has had this sense of responsibility; many have acted less like Cabinet-level officers than like glorified accountants. It is my hope that Mr. Darman, in exercising the power of his office, is able to distinguish between the two.

Mr. President, Director Darman has an unenviable task. On the one hand, he is faced with a $3 trillion debt, a $155 billion deficit, and a legacy of massive defense spending; on the other, he is confronted with a President who has publicly opposed raising taxes as well as with millions of Americans who depend on the Government for food, shelter, education, and general economic security. He will need our good will and, when asked, our collective advice. I offer them both.

Mr. KOHL. Mr. President, the budget deficit is the No. 1 economic problem facing our Nation. President Bush asked Richard Darman to lead the administration's fight to bring that deficit down. Mr. Darman has the potential to be an excellent Director and I support his nomination.

I listened to Mr. Darman during 2 days of hearing before the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs. He has a strong grasp of Government programs. He also has a demonstrated ability to work with Congress. On the strength of those two traits alone, he will go far.

I do have two reservations about this nomination. First, Mr. Darman was heavily involved in passage of the 1981 legislation that created these deficits. If we believe David Stockman's account, Mr. Darman understood that the legislation would generate huge deficits, but he chose to ignore that problem for political reasons. Mr. Darman disputes this account. At any rate, he worked in the following years to enact legislation that reversed some of the worst parts of the 1981 law.

My second reservation is that we have no idea where he will find the savings needed for deficit reduction. Taxes are ruled out by decree from the Presidential campaign. Where, then, will he turn to find the needed $40 billion in savings? Mr. Darman showed none of his cards. Ultimately, however, I do not lay this at his feet. The new President has done little to specify where he will make the cuts. Until President Bush provides us with more details, we cannot expect his aides to do so.

Mr. President, we can no longer afford to delay dealing with the deficit. The Nation is looking to President Bush for leadership. With the nomination of Richard Darman to be Director of the OMB, the President has started in the right direction.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All time has expired. The question is, will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of James Addison Baker III, of Texas, to be Secretary of State.

MEASURES INTRODUCED TODAY BY SENATOR PRESSLER

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I would like to summarize a group of measures I introduced today.

First of all, I introduced measures regarding the proposed congressional pay raise. One of these is a three-part bill, which I am happy to say now has at least a dozen Democratic and a dozen Republican cosponsors. That measure not only is a resolution of disapproval of the pay raise but also provides for a rescission that would go to the House desk. It also provides that, in the future, all pay raises would have to be voted upon. I explained the purpose of that measure in a statement this afternoon. It was carefully crafted, on a bipartisan basis, and it has support from both sides of the aisle. I believe it would be a very responsible step for the U.S. Senate to vote on that. One of my key concerns is that these raises be voted on in both Houses, as I think our Constitution requires.

Mr. President, in addition to resolutions and bills to require a vote now and in the future on any congressional pay raise, today I introduced 10 other bills and resolutions on a variety of subjects which represent some of my legislative priorities for this Congress. These include:

First, a resolution calling for the negotiation of an International Agricultural Conservation Reserve Treaty. Such a treaty would reduce world surplus grain stocks caused by Government subsidies, increase grain prices, and reduce soil erosion on fragile lands.

Second, the 1991 Mount Rushmore Commemorative Coin Act. This legislation would authorize the sale of a coin to commemorate the 50th anniversary of Mount Rushmore, our national shrine of democracy.

Third, the Student Financial Assistance Amendments Act. My bill proposes to strengthen educational opportunities for students who need financial assistance to attend postsecondary educational institutions.

Fourth, a bill to extend authorization of the Great Plains Conservation Program. This highly efficient, cost-effective voluntary conservation program has yielded $4 in additional agricultural income for each dollar expended. It deserves early reauthorization consideration.

Fifth, the Cable Television Programming Competition and Consumer Protection Act of 1989. This bill would prohibit the practice of volume discounting and exclusive distributorships used by premium cable programmers to discriminate against small competitors of large cable companies. It would enhance the availability of premium programming to rural consumers.

Mr. President, let me say, as a member of the Communications Subcommittee of the Committee on Commerce, that I am very concerned about the poor treatment small cable companies receive from the big program distributors. They are charged higher prices, they are held up, they are given the Chinese water torture treatment, in terms of getting cable programming, and I think it is very unfair.

Sixth, the Joint and Several Liability Reform Act of 1989. This bill would reform the doctrine of joint and several liability by requiring liability to be proportioned according to the actual degree of responsibility, except where the parties have engaged in concerted action. In the latter case, the liability of each defendant would still be joint and several.

This addresses the problems of many smaller cities which literally have been forced to shut off certain municipal services and are in need of day care centers. Day care centers in my State have closed because of insurance and liability problems. We have too many lawsuits in our society; we need to settle problems in other ways. We need to reduce costs without depriving the public of their rights.

Seventh, a resolution declaring November 1989 as "National Alzheimer's Disease Month." This resolution heightens public awareness of the devastating Alzheimer's disease and recognizes the work of organizations fighting to combat it.

Mr. President, my father suffers from Alzheimer's disease. I have been active in an Alzheimer's support group, and this resolution would improve public awareness of this disease.

Eighth, a bill to prohibit further U.S. military or economic assistance to Turkey until certain conditions are met by Turkey regarding its continuing illegal occupation of Cyprus.

Ninth, a bill to establish a rural mobility task force. The Rural Mobility Task Force Act would operate within the Urban Mass Transit Administration to ensure fair consideration of rural transportation needs in mass transit funding decisions.

Tenth, a resolution to establish a Nation Children's Day on the second Sunday in October. We have Mother's Day and Father's Day. This resolution would declare, as many other nations have, that children deserve equal treatment.

Mr. President, I look forward to working with the President pro tempore and our other distinguished colleagues during this 101st Congress.

CHILD CARE

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, it is not necessary to recite the need for the kind of child care that is increasingly a requirement for America's working families. I will not do that. I will simply state that last year, Senator DODD exerted great leadership in introducing legislation which has come to be known as the ABC bill.

Again, yesterday, he held hearings in his subcommittee of the Committee on Labor and Human Services with respect to the subject of child care, specifically on the ABC bill.

He graciously allowed me to testify with respect to an alternative approach which I have offered as legislation, which I introduced earlier this afternoon as S. 55, the Kids in Day Care Services Act of 1989. Essentially my concern is expressed in the statement that I have earlier introduced. But let me state it simply in this fashion: I think the one-size-fits-all approach where Federal officials with the best intentions and motivations seek to mandate a certain number of slots and preapprove child care facilities is one that severely limits choice, both for the States, more importantly for working parents as consumers of child care, and it seems to me that we can do better.

It seems to me that we ought to maximize choice and flexibility to respond to the very different needs to different communities and indeed different cultures within those communities.

In my own State of California we have come to be, I suspect, the most multiethnic and multicultural society in the Nation, and the differences in the cultural background of those working parents sometimes dictates a different response to the need for child care.

I am also concerned lest we overregulate some who as senior citizens, whether they be neighbors or members of a family, can afford a rich resource for potential child care. I do not think it would be wise for us to falsely limit their ability to participate. So in short, the kids bill, S. 55, offers an alternative approach and one that I think we need to give close attention to because if we are concerned with the adequacy of child care we need to be concerned with many things. The fact that there are not sufficient facilities arises from the reluctance of small business to find themselves encumbered with liability. We need to be concerned about that, Mr. President. We need to be concerned ultimately that there is choice given to the hand that rocks the cradle rather than well-motivated bureaucrats.

At the same time there is another need and again it is one that has grown so clear that we need not really recite the background for necessity of addressing it and it has to do with health care not of children but of older Americans. Increasingly older Americans face the expectation that they will require nursing home care or alternatively home visits by health care professionals. As we grow older it is an increasing expectation that we will experience health problems that require one or the other approach. But today for millions and millions of Americans the gnawing anxiety which is theirs which exceeds even their concern over catastrophic illness is that they will be unable to find or afford that kind of long-term health care. In offering S. 38 this afternoon, with some 38 cosponsors, about equally divided on both sides of the aisle, we are offering what I think is a worthy experiment. This is a bill which is entitled the Federal Employees Long Term Care Insurance Act of 1989. Simply stated, it affords a new option to Federal employees enrolled in the Federal Employees Group Life Insurance plan so that they will be able to exercise the option to convert some portion of the face value of the equity in their life insurance to prepaid health care. Either the kind of long-term care that is so unavailable to them in the form of nursing home care or home visits by health care professionals.

Mr. President, before we embark on a brand new umbrella program to include even those who can care for themselves by exercising some prudence and foresight, we should first determine what the real need is for a taxpayers-supported program.

One of the great benefits of the approach that I am offering in S. 38 with all of these cosponsors is that the employers, the Federal Government as the employer spending tax dollars, makes no increased contribution. The contribution continues to be the same. There is a slight increased contribution required of the insured but what that will do is offer not only to millions of Federal employees the kind of health care coverage which they cannot now find which they cannot afford but if it works for Federal employees there is no reason why that experience cannot be replicated for the employees of, say, the University of California or the employees of General Motors or any sufficiently large number of public or private sector employees to afford a basis for this kind of risk sharing.

Mr. President, I hope that I can increase the number of cosponsors from 38 to 58 to 68. I think this is an approach that we must try. I thank the chair.

THE PAY RAISE

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I want to send two resolutions to the desk. They have been shared with the majority leader and Republican leader.

First, on behalf of Senators PRESSLER, GRASSLEY, MCCAIN, and on my own behalf. And the second resolutions on my own behalf.

I am not seeking consideration of the resolutions at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the majority leader wish to be heard?

Mr. MITCHELL. No.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, if I might have the attention of the majority leader, he has had an opportunity to view the proposed resolutions which are in fact proposed rules changes. I have submitted two resolutions. I intend to seek the calling up of only one. But the effect of either is to amend the Senate rules to block the pay raise, which obviously is going to go into effect automatically on February 8, for reasons which I will cite in a few moments.

But I wanted to ask the majority leader if he has had an opportunity to review the proposed rules changes?

Mr. MITCHELL. I have had an opportunity to read them. I have done no more than that.

Mr. HUMPHREY. That is all you have to do. You get the drift pretty quickly. They are short and sweet.

A question about the Senate schedule, if I may? I understand that no votes are now anticipated until Tuesday?

Mr. MITCHELL. That is correct.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The next session of the Senate, the next day the Senate will both be in session and voting is Tuesday. Obviously by then a calendar day will have passed since I introduced these resolutions, and under the rules, the resolution may be considered. That is, the 1-day notice, if you will, will obviously have been fulfilled.

It is going to be my intent to try to somehow bring up whichever of the two resolutions I choose to bring up just as quickly as possible. I wanted to ask the majority leader if he would not support my bringing up whichever of the two I choose on Tuesday, which will be the next opportunity?

Mr. MITCHELL. As the Senator knows, his resolutions are not the only legislative effort with respect to the pay raise. There are, I believe, at least three others that have been or will be introduced, to my knowledge. And there may be additional ones.

I am not prepared at this time to commit myself to any particular one.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have not read any of the others except those of the Senator. And to any particular time.

As I understand it, the Senator is also a cosponsor of the resolution introduced by Senator PRESSLER?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is his request to me to consider his resolution. May I take that as an indication that I need not consider the resolution of Senator PRESSLER? Or are you asking that they both be considered?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am asking now that my resolution changing the rules so as to block the pay raise be considered on Tuesday, the next opportunity.

Mr. MITCHELL. But may I take your request to mean, therefore, that you do not request that I take up Senator PRESSLER's resolution?

Mr. HUMPHREY. No, that is not my request. They are not exactly the same. They are significantly different.

I support both.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, I think the fact that we have, to my knowledge, a minimum of five resolutions, I believe the appropriate course would be to permit myself, and all Senators, to read them, consider them, and attempt to make a judgment in consultation with the Senator and others on the most appropriate course to present the question to the Senate.

As the Senator from New Hampshire knows, I discussed with him and with numerous of the other opponents of the pay raise the various resolutions, in an attempt to determine what the best, most fair and appropriate schedule for presenting this matter to the Senate would be, and I do not believe that either I, the Senator from New Hampshire, or anyone else is sufficiently informed at this point on all of the facts to enable us to reach the best conclusion.

So I think it is best to defer a decision on that for this time.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I understand. I thank the Senator for his answer.

One other question about the schedule. Will it, under whatever unanimous consent or recess arrangement you make for this weekend and Friday, will it be in order to—we are going to be in session on Friday; is that correct?

Mr. MITCHELL. I beg your pardon?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Are we going to be in session on Friday of this week?

Mr. MITCHELL. We will be in session on Friday for pro forma purposes.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Will it be in order Friday to introduce bills and resolutions?

Mr. MITCHELL. No, it will not.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. Thank you.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I want to address the pay raise issue generally and the resolutions which I have introduced specifically. I said a moment ago that it is now a foregone conclusion, it would seem, that this 50-percent pay raise is going to go into effect automatically. I say it is a foregone conclusion because the leadership on the House side has sent around a letter stating that from January 23, which was yesterday, until February 8, and including February 8, the House will be in pro forma session. That is a nice fancy term, "pro forma session." What it means is the leadership have told the Members of the House to get out of town until after the deadline expires. The deadline for rejecting this pay raise is midnight of February 7. The House is going to be in pro forma session, which is to say no votes will be had until February 9. They even gave themselves an extra margin of 1 day just to make sure they did not come back too soon. The leadership has dismissed the House. No matter what the Senate may do in the way of rejecting this pay raise, there is no possibility the House can act timely before the expiration of this statutory deadline because the House has been dismissed, for all practical purposes.

How do you like that for brassy arrogence? I have never seen anything like it. How do you like that for callous indifference toward public sentiment on this issue which has aroused so much indignation, and rightfully so, in my opinion?

Fifty percent on the face is absurd. I am not nearly as upset by the amount of the pay raise as the dishonest procedure by which Members secure such a pay raise. I am upset about it because it has a very long-term pernicious effect on respect, if there is any left for this institution of the Congress, amongst the public; it has a long-term pernicious effect upon trust and decency in Government.

It was not intended to be this way. Stealing pay raises without even voting on them. Shame on us.

Regarding the power of Members to set their wages, James Madison said at the Virginia convention on ratifying the Federal Constitution:

"This is a power which cannot be abused," he assured his fellow delegates. "This is a power which cannot be abused without rousing universal attention."

He was saying they can never get away with greed in the Congress.

This is a power which cannot be abused without rousing the universal attention and indignation should the general Congress annex wages disproportionate to their service or repugnant to the sense of the community.

He said, "They would be universally execrated."

Well, James Madison was a pretty bright fellow and helped design the best system of government in the world, but he never anticipated the greed and the dishonesty and the cowardice of this Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time allocated for morning business has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to continue for 10 minutes, if I may. I think the majority leader is aware I have been seeking all day to be recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. Reserving the right to object, there are other Senators waiting and other Senators have been here all day and every other Senator has had 5 minutes. I will be glad to give the Senator additional time. May I ask the Senator SIMPSON be permitted to have his 5 minutes, following which the Senator from New Hampshire may have an additional 5 minutes? Is that satisfactory?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Frankly, no. May I have 10 minutes? I may not need that. It is an important subject. People are interested in this.

Mr. MITCHELL. I recognize that. The Senator is not the only person here. Every other Senator has abided by the request.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I will be happy to wait until all other Senators seeking recognition have been heard.

EXTENSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Wyoming be entitled to his 5 minutes, following which the Senator from New Hampshire be entitled to an additional 10 minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will that be the last request if that is approved?

Mr. HUMPHREY. For today.

Mr. MITCHELL. For today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, that was a very gracious act of the majority leader. I will assure my colleague from New Hampshire that indeed the schedule has been adhered to and in part of the order of the day. So that has been an accommodation to my friend, Senator HUMPHREY, which has not been extended to others. I know he is appreciative of that. Indeed, I have been in this post serving as assistant leader, and understand we do have our personal lives to lead. That is one of the fine things about this effort of Senator MITCHELL. I appreciate that very much. It is an extraordinary act.

Hopefully he will not take all that off my 5 minutes. Oh, yes, he probably will.

SPIRIT OF COOPERATION

Mr. SIMPSON. We have had the inauguration. We have now seen the change in cadence, of democracy's march completed once again every 4 years. It has been an impressive pageant of pomp and circumstance. We have seen the election of George Bush; the selection of GEORGE MITCHELL as the majority leader. I think it augers well for the coming session.

I just wanted to share with our colleagues that our mission here is to legislate. It is not to cut ribbons. It is not to do television activity or radio activity. It is to legislate, and it is a very great pleasure for me to note the majority leader is a legislator. I have served with him on two committees. I think I am one of the few who has had the experience in 8 years to serve with him on Environment and Public Works and Veterans' Affairs. It is such a pleasure to engage in the travails of the legislator—and I do consider myself a legislator. I do not lust for another office. I find this a most remarkable arena for my skills and activities, whatever God has given me to perform. And so it is a great pleasure to see a legislator, and certainly Senator BYRD also is a remarkable legislator, skillful parliamentarian, a legislator who has been in the trench in recent years trying to pass legislation for the benefit of the people of the country. That is what our work is about. Nothing more; nothing more mysterious.

So as we embark on this remarkable adventure with a new President and these tremendous challenges—and we all know what they are. We are all grown men and women. We do not have to talk about them. They are here. They are all about us. And we have to do it. We have the savings and loans, nuclear weapons facilities, environmental issues, clean air, the whole spectrum.

So I do think as others have said, there is one instance as I sat on the West Front of the Capitol ground on that impressive day that the response from the crowd started from the back instead of the front. That was when President Bush said something to the effect—I paraphrase—that bickering is not going to get it done because really I have found and believe deeply that the people of America could not care one whit whether you have a Republican amendment passed or a Democrat amendment passed or whether the filibuster went all night, who was leading it, who was opposed or who ate the cabbage or who did this with regard to cloture. They just want to know why we do not get our work done.

We had a bipartisan leadership meeting with the President yesterday.

The majority leader gave a powerful series of remarks this morning. The American people expect a new spirit of cooperation. They want results and not bickering, and I admire the majority leader. I think he is ready to do that. I personally know him to be a very fair and hardworking Senator. Together all of us can achieve good results. I am excited, and it will be a pleasure to work with the majority leader, with BOB DOLE, our superb leader on our side of the aisle, Senator CRANSTON, my counterpart, on that side of the aisle.

I am sure the honeymoon will be over soon. In fact, they will be crashing down the door of the bridal suite any day now. The point is we can do our business differently than we have in the past, with new people in the White House, not to say that any of those who were here before have failed in any way. It just is a renewed opportunity, and I look forward to it with great anticipation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. I merely want to thank my friend and colleague, Senator SIMPSON, and tell him how much I look forward to working with him in this coming session for the objectives which he so eloquently described. I thank my colleague.

Mr. HUMPHREY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my remarks be printed so as not to be interrupted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONGRESSIONAL PAY RAISE

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, James Madison obviously underestimated badly the greed and the cowardice of the 101st Congress, but he was right about the universal execration in which Members of Congress would be held if they sought a pay raise all out of proportion to their services. Certainly that is the case now and certainly it is the case, even more so, since Members have devised a way of doing it without even leaving their fingerprints, without casting a vote and without leaving themselves accountable in any way to the voters.

This automatic pay raise provision is an abomination. It is an abomination because it destroys the accountability that holds our system together. It destroys the accountability to the voters, to the citizens which James Madison and the founders believed would be a check on human nature.

Let us face it; we are all human, and we all would like more money. That is human. But when you destroy accountability, you foster cynicism and abuse.

The sneaky pay raise of 1989 is more than a matter of money. It is an attack upon decency in our system of government, and that is why we who are in support of Senator PRESSLER and Senator GRASSLEY and others intend somehow, we are determined somehow, with the help of the leadership or without the help of the leadership, to secure a vote. We are determined to secure a vote on this pay raise issue.

Furthermore, this automatic pay raise provision must be repealed. If Members of Congress want a pay raise, let them vote for it, publicly and honorably. A pay raise without a vote is stealing. It is that simple. You take something without permission, that is not yours, it is stealing. A pay raise without a vote is nothing less than stealing. It is stealing from every honorable citizen, every man, every woman who struggles to maintain a household. It is stealing even from young people who work and pay taxes and save their after-tax money for education and other worthy purposes. It is stealing from the citizens unless it is done in an honorable, public fashion, unless it is done with a vote. That is the way we do things around here. We vote. We make choices on public policy by voting. That is what we get paid for, and so as one editorial I read recently said, "Come on, let's vote." Either that or it is stealing. And it is more than just greed. This grab is more than just greed under the circumstances I have described. It is debauchery. A pay raise without a vote is more than cleverness. It is cowardice. For our part, we are not prepared to let the congressional leadership in the House act as the paymasters of bandits. Members of Congress get paid to vote. The American people want a vote, and we intend to secure one by one means or another, sooner or later.

Mr. President, the legislation introduced by Senator PRESSLER is designed to eliminate the deadline in the current statute. The deadline, as I said, expires at midnight on February 7. The House has devised the most incredibly brazen means of avoiding a vote between now and then. They have told the Members to go home. Most of them have left town. They are hiding in corners, probably under rugs, a few of them. They have left town. There is no way they would have an opportunity to disapprove of this pay raise. It really is shocking. The legislation Senator PRESSLER has advanced will eliminate this deadline so that whenever and if the Senate passes this legislation, as I believe it will, and the House should take up that legislation, the pay raise will be repealed.

Now, the challenge, of course, will be to get the House to take up that legislation. The leadership, based on their perfidious conduct this week, will no doubt just let that Senate legislation lie there until it disintegrates from old age. It does not take a genius to figure out what they are going to do over there, and so we will be forced, if necessary, and we are prepared, if necessary, to offer this legislation as an amendment on every must-pass bill that the Senate sends to the House.

I hope we do not have to do that, but I suspect that we will and we shall. This is a matter of decency or indecency, a matter of doing things right and honorably and in a manly fashion or stealing from the American people. I would certainly be willing to support a cost-of-living increase for Members of Congress, maybe a little more to get rid of less honoraria, although I do not believe it is necessary for people to bribe us to stop us from doing whatever we should do. But I would be willing to entertain something reasonable, providing Senators and Members of the House stand up and vote for it in public, yes or no, on the record.

So that is our intent. We recognize it is not going to be easy, given the dishonorable tactics employed by the House leadership 2 years ago and now again this week, even more dishonorable this week than the last time. At least we had a fighting chance 2 years ago to get a vote before the deadline. As it was 2 years ago, the House deliberately waited until the deadline had expired and then voted the next day and Members could go home and say, "Yes, I voted against the pay raise," knowing full well that under the arrangement made by the House leadership such a vote was completely null and void. It had no meaning whatever.

Well, this year they are not even staying in session. They have dismissed the House. They are in pro forma session. "No more votes this week, boys and girls. Go home and hide from the public and let this thing go into effect automatically"—pretty shocking, disgraceful, disgusting. This Senator is tired of it and intends to oppose it with every means at his disposal.

I thank the Chair. I thank the majority leader especially for his graciousness and patience. I wish him well, as do others. I am delighted to have him at the head of our once-distinguished body and which perhaps can be restored.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. THURMOND (for himself, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. BIDEN, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. SPECTER, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. SIMON, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. BOREN, Mr. PRESSLER, Mr. SIMPSON, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. HARKIN, Mr. PELL, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. SANFORD, and Mr. HEINZ):

S. 1. A bill to amend section 207 of title 18, United States Code, to prohibit Members of Congress and officers and employees of any branch of the U.S. Government from attempting to influence the U.S. Government or from representing or advising a foreign entity for a proscribed period after such officer or employee leaves Government service, and for other purposes; read the first time.

INTEGRITY IN POST EMPLOYMENT ACT

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, on October 21, 1988, Congress passed the Post Employment Restrictions Act of 1988, major ethics legislation, which strengthens laws against lobbying by high-level Federal officials immediately after they leave public service. This legislation passed the Senate unanimously and the House by an overwhelming margin. Unfortunately, the President pocket vetoed this bill. Although the President vetoed this proposal, enactment of strong, effective ethics legislation continues to be vital. The bill being introduced today, the same that passed the Senate on April 19, 1988, provides a uniform, straightforward, and enforceable way to prevent those who are employed by the Federal Government from leaving public service and marketing their access and influence for financial gain. In addition, the legislation prevents Federal employees from vending sensitive information vital to national interests to foreign interests for profit.

I am pleased that Senator BIDEN, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, and others are joining me as original cosponsors of this legislation, with such strong initial support, I am confident that this important bill can swiftly move through the legislative process.

Clear threats arise out of the abusive use of access and influence and the vending of sensitive information: First, damage to the integrity of Government, as undue and improper influence is brought to bear on decisionmaking processes; second, erosion of public confidence in the operation of the Government, as the American people sense former employees are exerting, or appear to be exerting, improper influence on current Government decisions; and third, jeopardy to the national interests, as some former employees advise foreign clients based on sensitive information gained while in positions of trust with the Federal Government.

I introduced my original proposal in the 99th Congress on April 17, 1986. The bill was referred to the Judiciary Committee where two hearings were held on April 29, 1986, and June 18, 1986. The original legislation was debated by the full committee on June 19, 1986, and June 26, 1986, at which time the bill was reported by the committee.

Since no floor action occurred prior to adjournment of the 99th Congress, the bill was reintroduced in the 100th Congress. On May 19, 1987, the full Judiciary Committee considered the legislation at which time it was reported by the committee.

In April 1988, the full Senate began consideration of the legislation. After a full debate, the legislation was passed by the Senate by unanimous voice vote on April 19, 1988.

Regarding the House, it acted on a proposal that incorporated many of the Senate provisions. Their legislative proposal was considered by the House Judiciary Committee after hearings were held. After informal discussions without a conference between House and Senate Members, on October 21, 1988, the House debated and passed its proposal. On that same day, due to the short time left in the 100th session, the Senate acted on and passed this legislation.

Briefly, I would like to highlight certain provisions included in this legislation which I am introducing today. Major features of this bill would restrict Members of Congress from lobbying the legislative branch and top executive branch officials for 12 months after leaving Government service. Top congressional staff could not lobby the body in which they worked for 1 year. The highest executive branch officials would not lobby the executive branch or Members of Congress for 12 months after termination of employment. Other top executive branch officials could not lobby their former agency for this same period. Additionally, Members, top congressional staff, and high-level executive officials could not be employed by, represent, or advise foreign governments or foreign political parties for 18 months.

In addition, this legislation maintains the lifetime ban in current law that prohibits all executive branch employees from lobbying on any issue in which they had "a personal and substantial" involvement while in Government service.

Under the bill, foreign entities are defined as foreign governments, foreign political parties, or foreign organizations substantially controlled by either. Also, exemptions are included which allow lobbying by former Government officials for certain charitable, scholastic, or humanitarian purposes.

Maximum criminal penalties of $250,000 in fines and 5-year prison terms, or both, are included in the measure, as well as a provision that allows, along with any criminal action, recovery of up to twice the amount of proceeds obtained by any individual who violates restrictions in the bill.

The act would become effective 9 months after the legislation is signed into law.

In conclusion, I believe my original bill was an appropriate starting place for Congress to consider much-needed changes to the weak, confusing, and oftentimes conflicting laws governing former Members and Federal officials who lobby the Government or work for a foreign entity. The legislation being introduced today fine tunes my original proposal. Should additional modifications be necessary to further improve and strengthen this legislation, they will be considered. I urge swift action on this bill.

In closing, when we face a serious problem such as the misuse of influence and access or vending of sensitive information vital to national interests, we have two alternatives—do nothing, or take steps to resolve the problem. I believe we must take action to prevent irreparable damage to our Nation and to restore public confidence and integrity in our system of Government. It is time that public service be just that—not merely a stepping stone for future employment or profit. The American people demand, deserve, and expect a standard of ethics which will instill confidence in all of us that this Government makes decisions based on the merits of an issue, not based on positions taken by those who have the most access, influence, or financial clout.

I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

Any such disciplinary action shall be subject to review in a United States district court. Departments, agencies, or commissions shall, in consultation with the Director of the Office of Government Ethics, establish procedures and issue regulations to carry out this subsection.

"(4) INJUNCTIVE RELIEF.—Upon a showing that a person has engaged in conduct prohibited by subsection (a), (b), (c), or (d) of this section, the United States may obtain an injunction to stop or prevent such conduct.

"(2) Whoever, being the partner of a Member, officer or employee of the legislative branch in a partnership for the provision of professional services, knowingly acts as an agent or attorney for, or otherwise represents, any other person other than the United States by physical presence in a formal or informal appearance before, or with intent to influence makes any oral or written communication on behalf of any other person other than the United States to any Member, officer, employee or other component part of the House in which the Member, officer or employee serves in connection with a matter pending before either House or a matter which is the subject of legislative oversight in either House shall be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both: Provided, however, That the prohibition of this subsection shall not prohibit a formal or informal appearance before, or oral or written contact to a Member, officer, employee or other component part of either House on behalf of the partnership itself. For the purposes of this paragraph, the term 'professional services' includes but is not limited to those involving a fiduciary relationship.

"(h) TESTIMONY.—Nothing in this section shall prevent a person from giving testimony under oath, or from making statements required to be made under penalty of perjury.

"(i) DEFENSE.—In an action under paragraph (1), (2), or (3) of subsection (c) of this section, it is an affirmative defense, which the defendant must establish by a preponderance of the evidence, that the defendant acted without receiving or the expectation of receiving, directly or indirectly, any compensation, financial gain, or remuneration.

"(j) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this section—

"(1) The term 'foreign entity' includes—

"(A) the government of a foreign country as defined in section 611(e) of title 22;

"(B) a foreign political party as defined in section 611(f) of title 22; and

"(C) a foreign organization substantially controlled by a foreign country or foreign political party.

"(4) For purposes of subsection (c), the term 'intent to influence' means the intent to affect any official action by a Government entity of the United States through any officer or employee of the United States including Members of Congress.".

(b) TECHNICAL AMENDMENT.—The table of sections for chapter 11 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by striking out the item relating to section 207 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(i)(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, no candidate who, in connection with his campaign for election to Federal office, makes expenditures from his personal funds or the personal funds of his immediate family to his campaign committee, or makes a loan from such funds to such committee, shall use any other contributions which are made by any other person after the election to such candidate or the principle campaign committee of such candidate to repay any such expenditure or loan.

"(2) For purposes of this subsection, 'immediate family' means a candidate's spouse, and any child, stepchild, parent, grandparent, brother, half-brother, sister or half-sister of the candidate, and the spouse of any such person and any child, step-child, parent, grandparent, brother, half-brother, sister or half-sister of the candidate's spouse and any spouse of any such person.".

SEC. 203. SEVERABILITY.—If any provision of this title or the application of any such provision to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the remainder of this Act and the application of any provision to any other person or circumstance shall not be affected thereby.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with Senators THURMOND, LEVIN, BIDEN, and others in the introduction of the Post-Employment Restrictions Act of 1989. We began the effort to strengthen the laws against lobbying by former Government officials in the 99th Congress. The Senate came close to passing a bill in 1986, only to be stymied during the last days of the Congress. Last fall, after extensive discussions and negotiations with Members of the Senate and the House, the Congress passed legislation, which would have greatly strengthened and improved the current, extremely weak, bar on lobbying by former officials. To the surprise of the Nation, the President chose to veto this measure. This veto was yet another sad chapter in the administration's consistent history of ignoring the importance of high ethical standards.

The measure we are introducing today is virtually identical to the one which passed the Senate in April of 1988 (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, April 19, 1988, pp. S4265-4267). This version of the bill is substantially better than the one which eventually was sent to the President. It represents a stronger, clearer, and more easily enforced set of restrictions against the unseemly practice of high level officials lobbying their friends days after they have left office. In brief, the basic provisions of the bill are the following:

Former Members of Congress are barred from lobbying Congress and top level officials in the executive branch for 1 year.

Former top level officials in the executive branch are barred from lobbying the executive branch and Members of Congress for 1 year.

Former senior officials in the executive branch, compensated at the rate of GS-16 and above, are barred from lobbying their own agency for 1 year.

Former senior congressional staff, compensated at the rate of GS-16 and above, are barred from lobbying the House of Congress for which they worked for 1 year.

All the persons listed above are barred from working for a foreign government, foreign political party, or organization controlled by a foreign government for 18 months.

Certain provisions in this bill deserve special comment in light of the President's veto message last fall.

First, the bill we are introducing today provides that the prohibition on lobbying on behalf of another person comes into play only if there has been compensation for the lobbying contact. The bill provides for an affirmative defense if there is no compensation. The President, in his veto message, argued that compensation should not be required for a violation.

Under the bill we are introducing today, it is not necessary to show that compensation was received for a particular contact, for example, for a particular telephone call or office visit. Direct or indirect compensation, such as a general retainer to lobby for a client on a matter, is sufficient to establish the compensation element. It is extremely rare that any significant lobbying contact made on behalf of another person involves no direct or indirect compensation. Therefore, I believe the approach in our bill is adequate to prohibit harmful contacts, without sweeping in innocent contacts on minor matters on behalf of relatives or neighbors.

Second, the President in his veto message claimed that the current lifetime ban on members of the executive branch, which prohibits them from representing a client on matters in which they have participated "personally and substantially," should also apply to Members of Congress. The lifetime ban, which is already part of current law, applies to "particular matters involving "specific parties," that is, particular contracts or legal proceedings. For example, an attorney who represents the Government in a particular lawsuit may not switch sides and represent the private defendant in the same suit. It is difficult to apply this same concept to Members of Congress, or congressional staff, since passage of legislation results in no ongoing proceeding such as a lawsuit or pending contract. Thus, I believe the President's objection was misplaced.

During the campaign last fall, President Bush endorsed the approach taken in the bill we are introducing today. Thus, while we remain open to discussions about the particular provisions in this bill, there is solid ground for believing that the administration will support a measure similar to them.

These provisions are modest and sensible. They will greatly reduce the unseemly spectacle of interest groups hiring lobbyists based on whom they know, not what they know. They will help restore public confidence in the processes of Government. I urge my colleagues to join us in the efforts to pass this bill expeditiously.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleagues today in introducing the Integrity in Post Employment Act of 1989. This legislation has a long history and I believe that the time has come, once and for all, to strengthen and clarify the criminal laws that apply to the post-employment activities of Federal officers and employees. The bill introduced today provides a uniform and enforceable way to prevent those who are employed by the Federal Government from improperly marketing their access and influence for private gain after leaving public service. I believe that it will go a long way toward restoring public faith and confidence in the integrity of our Government—faith and confidence that are necessary if our Government is to function effectively.

This legislation had its genesis in the 99th Congress, with the work of my friend and distinguished colleague from South Carolina, Senator THURMOND. Concerns about the postemployment activities of Government personnel were raised when a high-ranking Federal official left his post and immediately became a consultant for a foreign entity in connection with certain textile negotiations on which the former employee had worked. The specter of two former White House advisers peddling their influence also impelled us to reconsider the rules of ethical conduct by which the highest officials of our Government should be bound.

Under Senator THURMOND's chairmanship, the Judiciary Committee held hearings in the 99th Congress. Because of concerns that were raised about the scope of the legislation at that time, Senator THURMOND appointed an ad hoc subcommittee, of which I was a member, to revise the measure. Following the ad hoc subcommittee's extensive work to address the concerns that had been raised, the full committee reported the bill. Time ran out, however, and Congress did not have an opportunity to vote.

The legislation was reintroduced in the 100th Congress. It passed the Senate on April 19, 1988, due in large part to the hard work of Senators THURMOND, METZENBAUM, LEVIN, and RUDMAN. Negotiations with the House, which had passed a different version of the bill, continued for some time. Finally, in October, both Houses agreed on the text of postemployment legislation and a bill was sent to the President.

I was dismayed when President Reagan, in November, pocket vetoed the bill that was so carefully worked out in the closing days of the 100th Congress. While I share some of the concerns expressed by the President about maintaining our ability to attract topnotch men and women to Government service, I found the veto message, in general, to be short on substance and long on rhetoric.

For example, the President took us to task for not extending to the Congress the current lifetime ban on former executive branch employees lobbying on specific matters with which they were personally and substantially involved. This was not, as the President charged, sloppy and discriminatory, but instead reflected the fact that certain everyday executive actions—such as awarding a contract to a particular company—are not analogous to the work of Members of Congress.

I am hopeful that the President's veto will not deter this body. There remains a pressing need to strengthen and clarify current criminal conflict of interest laws that apply to the postemployment activities of executive branch personnel, and to establish—for the first time—criminal prohibitions on the postemployment activities of Members of Congress and senior congressional staff. The extension of these prohibitions to Congress is particularly noteworthy. It's about time, in my view, that we set standards that apply not just to others but to ourselves as well.

The bill that I have joined in introducing today—which is the same bill that passed the Senate on April 19, 1988—will, in my view, help ensure that Government decisions are truly made in the public interest by guarding against two principal evils.

First, the legislation will better protect Government decisionmaking from the use of clout—the efforts by some to use their influence with former colleagues to get phone calls returned, meetings scheduled, and decisions made in a manner outside the course of normal Government channels. Second, the legislation will protect against a form of insider trading—the practice by some of using information to which they were privy solely in their capacity as Government employees for their own personal profit or gain.

There is every indication that President Bush shares my desire for a comprehensive and effective bill. He is on record as having endorsed the bill that passed the Senate in April. In addition, the President has established a commission to examine our ethics laws. The commission is clearly a step in the right direction, and I commend President Bush for its establishment.

But I must sound a note of caution. Commissions often have a way of laboring slowly and getting caught up in overstudying a problem. For several years now, we in the Congress have studied the issues encompassed in this legislation, and we believe that the time has come to act. I look forward to learning of the commission's views and I am completely willing, where appropriate, to incorporate its recommendations into the bill introduced today. I would add, however, that neither the Congress nor the American people will tolerate undue delay.

I believe that this legislation is the first page in the final chapter of our effort to improve the standards by which former Government employees and officials conduct themselves and to restore the full faith of the American people in the integrity of our Government. We have sought to balance the compelling interest in fair and impartial decisionmaking with the need to protect fundamental first amendment rights and ensure that we continue to attract and retain highly qualified men and women to serve in Government. I am open to proposals to improve and strengthen the bill—particularly to reflect this balance—and I look forward to working with my colleagues who last year labored so strenuously.

As we move toward enactment of this important legislation, our work must be guided by Henry Clay's reminder that "government is a trust, and the officers of the government are trustees; and both the trust and the trustees are created for the benefit of the people."

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, when President Reagan vetoed the postemployment lobbying bill at the end of the last Congress, he made a mistake. Had he signed that bill, we would now have in a place the strong provisions we need to ensure that public officials are not able to cash in on their public office when they leave. We would have closed some serious loopholes in current law as they pertain to the executive branch and, more importantly, we would have covered members of top staff in Congress.

But the President passed up that chance to strengthen our ethics laws, so we are presented, again, with the need to pass legislation in this area.

The bill Senators THURMOND, METZENBAUM, BIDEN, and myself are introducing today is the same bill the Senate passed without dissent or objection in April of last year. It is not the same bill we sent to the President for signature. That bill was the product of a compromise worked out with the House in the waning days of the 100th Congress. Congressman BARNEY FRANK and I spent many hours in October negotiating the technical details of that compromise bill.

The bill we are introducing today is stronger than the bill President Reagan rejected as being too strong. It is also the bill President Bush endorsed during last year's Presidential campaign. It is because of the support for this bill in the Senate, coupled with President Bush's public support for the bill, that we will be seeking to place the bill directly on the calendar and not have it referred to committee. We hope to get this bill or legislation similar to it passed by the Senate before the April recess so we can negotiate with the House early in this session and have legislation on the President's desk before the July 4th recess.

Mr. President, we've got a serious problem that we must address. The public has seen and heard so much evidence in recent years involving what appears to be personal greed at the expense of good Government that they are losing trust in Government's ability to fairly and competently perform. We must attempt to eliminate unethical behavior on the part of our Federal officials. One way to do that is to strengthen our laws, and a significant step toward doing that is to strengthen and expand the law governing postemployment lobbying by Federal officials. That is the purpose of S. 1.

With the enactment of this legislation, we will send a strong message to the public that their Government is not for hire, that public service is not a commodity to be commercially traded.

We have had laws restricting lobbying by former Government officials in place for many years; 18 U.S.C. 207, the law which this bill amends, was originally enacted in 1962. The purpose of that law is to avoid unfair influence in the outcome of Government decisions by prohibiting the personal intervention of a recently departed Federal official connected either to the subject matter or the decisionmaker. It prohibits such contacts that have the appearance of having special influence and resulting in favored treatment, for a specified period of time, and it imposes criminal penalties for knowing violations.

What we have learned by observing the trials of Michael Deaver and Lyn Nofziger is that the statute which we thought was protecting us from the conduct we condemned has problems that need fixing. This bill attempts to fix those problems. But more than that, this bill expands some of the existing provisions to cover more people in more situations.

18 U.S.C. 207(c) of the postemployment lobbying law—the 1-year ban on lobbying your former agency—is quite limited in its application. As applied to persons at the GS-17 level or above and the military equivalent, it applies only to executive branch personnel; it bars such persons from lobbying only their former agency; and it gives the Office of Government Ethics [OGE] the authority to carve up agencies into even smaller units for purposes of the statute's coverage. The net result of that OGE action is a patchwork-type of system for determining the size of one's "former office." For example, the Executive Office of the President, now, is deemed to consist of 9 separate agencies for the purposes of this statute, but the Department of Agriculture is deemed to be one agency. It doesn't make sense. This bill eliminates that problem by eliminating the authority of OGE to carve up agencies.

The bill also includes Congress in its coverage for the first time. We are so often accused of making exceptions for ourselves in the statutes that we pass. In this bill we have an opportunity to bring Congress within coverage of one of our principal ethics statutes.

The bill would bar top-level Federal officials—except those in the judicial branch—that is, cabinet and deputy secretaries and Members of Congress—from lobbying anywhere in their own branch and any top-level official in the other branch for a year. And, as with current law, it bars senior officials from lobbying their former agency. However, it expands the coverage of senior officials from certain designated officials who are paid at a GS-17 level or above (current law) to anyone—including congressional staff—who is paid at a GS-16 level or above.

The bill increases the size of criminal penalties and also establishes civil sanctions. It also creates a new offense by making unlawful, lobbying on behalf of a former official who is barred from direct lobbying.

This bill is a significant improvement over current law. It makes the current law more precise, tougher, more likely to be enforced and, therefore, more likely to be followed.

As many of you know, President Bush is going to appoint a bipartisan commission on ethics which is expected to address, among other issues, this legislation. It is anticipated that the commission will report its findings and conclusions within 30 days of appointment and that President Bush will use that report as the basis for his legislative proposal in this area.

Mr. President, the sponsors of this bill are prepared to delay for a reasonable period of time the Senate's consideration of this legislation in order to give the new President an opportunity to present us with his proposal. And we look forward to it. For that reason, while we will seek to place this bill directly on the calendar for Senate consideration, we will postpone any floor action on the bill for a reasonable period of time in order to give President Bush the opportunity to put together his proposal. If however, the President's proposal is not ready by that time, we are prepared to proceed to Senate consideration. I urge the President, therefore, to act with all due speed on this matter.

In closing, Mr. President, I would like to remind us all that the vast majority of our public officials act with integrity and commitment to public service. I am confident that they will understand the need for this legislation as an instrument for preserving the public's trust. And for the few public officials who cross the line, or for whom the line is an unavoidable temptation, this legislation makes taking such a step tougher and imposes more severe consequences.

Mr. President, I thank my colleagues, particularly Senators METZENBAUM and THURMOND, with whom I have worked on this bill over the past year, for their perseverance and commitment.

By Mr. BYRD (for himself, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. NUNN, Mr. WARNER, Mr. BOREN, Mr. COHEN, and Mr. DANFORTH):

S. 2. A bill to amend the War Powers Resolution to provide expedited procedures for legislation requiring the disengagement of U.S. Armed Forces involved in hostilities or providing specified authorization for their continued engagement in such hostilities, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

WAR POWERS RESOLUTION AMENDMENTS

● Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce with my colleagues, the distinguished majority leader, Senator MITCHELL, the distinguished President pro tempore and chairman of the Appropriations Committee, Senator BYRD, the distinguished chairman of the Armed Services Committee, Senator NUNN, the distinguished chairman of the Intelligence Committee, Senator BOREN, the distinguished ranking minority member of the Intelligence Committee, Senator COHEN, and the distinguished ranking minority member of the Commerce, Science, and Transportation Committee, Senator DANFORTH, the War Powers Amendments of 1989.

Mr. President, it has become obvious to the cosponsors of these amendments and to other Members of this body that the war powers amendment, as presently written, does not work. The War Powers Resolution does not assist the Congress in making constructive contributions to policies involving the use of U.S. Armed Forces, and at times, the War Powers Resolution can actually prevent the Congress from exercising its authority over and accepting its responsibility for the use of the Armed Forces. Quite bluntly, the War Powers Resolution has not worked in the past, is not working now, and will not work in the future.

For these reasons, I joined with Senators MITCHELL, BYRD, and NUNN last year in introducing Senate Joint Resolution 323, the War Powers Resolution Amendments of 1988. I am pleased to say that as a result of the introduction of that resolution, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee formed a special Subcommittee on War Powers, chaired by my friend and colleague, Senator BIDEN, which conducted a number of hearings on the subject of war powers. I am hopeful that this review begun last year will continue as the result of the introduction of this resolution today.

From its enactment over a Presidential veto in 1973, the War Powers Resolution has been beset by a host of problems, not the least of which is the fact that at least two of its operative provisions are of questionable constitutionality. Another serious problem with the existing resolution is its framework under which the Congress could purportedly exercise its authority and responsibility over use of the Armed Forces by congressional inaction. The provision calling for termination of the use of forces after 60 days unless Congress extends that authority casts doubt about the Nation's ability to make and keep foreign policy commitments. The uncertainty of American resolve resulting from this statutory timetable could lead to increased hostilities and to an unwillingness of adversaries to negotiate until and unless the Congress extends the automatic deadline. It is for these very reasons that not a single President since the enactment of the War Powers Resolution in 1973, be he Republican or Democrat, has acceded to the authority of the resolution. Furthermore, Mr. President, it is exactly because of the uncertainties created by the War Powers Resolution that Members of this body have been reluctant through the years to trigger its provisions.

Mr. President, the purpose underlying the War Powers Resolution was to increase the involvement of the Congress in decisions to introduce and to utilize U.S. Armed Forces in situations involving hostilities or imminent hostilities. In my opinion, the present resolution has just the opposite effect. If we, as Members of the Congress, wish to accomplish this purpose, it is incumbent upon us to fashion legislation that will have that effect. It is for this reason that I join today with my colleagues in introducing the War Powers Resolution Amendments of 1989.

Mr. President, the Senate joint resolution which we introduce today is a continuing effort to address the shortcomings in the present law. The amendments proposed today will remove from the War Powers Resolution those provisions most often described as unconstitutional and will replace the automatic 60-day termination provision with expedited procedures for the consideration of a traditional legislative vehicle, subject to the veto by a President, which could then be overridden, in appropriate cases, by the Congress. Furthermore, the amendments proposed today would provide for the Congress to exercise its oversight authority and responsibility through Congress' well recognized power of the purse.

Mr. President, the resolution introduced today is a serious and sincere effort by its cosponsors to "clean our own house." Now, with President Bush's pledge to seek a new bipartisanship in foreign policy, we in Congress have a unique opportunity to work with, rather than against the executive branch to correct the difficulties in the War Powers Resolution. If we are not willing to admit and attempt to correct shortcomings in legislation intended to enhance the role of the Congress in the foreign policy arena, we cannot and should not expect support in our efforts from either of the other branches of Government or from the American people. And without that support we cannot and should not succeed.●

● Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleagues under the leadership of the majority leader in this bipartisan effort to amend the War Powers Resolution. This legislation can be an important step through which the President and Congress could cooperate in a meaningful way in the formulation of our foreign policy.

As provided by this bill, regular consultation by the President with the leaders of Congress will, I believe, strengthen our foreign policy through a bipartisan consensus. It will reverse the deterioration of the executive-legislative partnership that began during the Vietnam war.

The President can and should initiate but must have support within the Congress to systematically sustain and give credibility to any foreign policy.

Deleting the provision that Congress must specifically authorize the presence of U.S. Armed Forces in hostile situations within 60 days is key to correcting the problems of the present War Powers Resolution. The expedited procedures under which Congress would consider a resolution of approval or disapproval recommended by the permanent consultative body are comprehensive and workable.

It is time to put an end to the frequent reversals of direction in foreign policy caused by Executive and congressional struggles which have emboldened our enemies and confused and demoralized our friends. I urge my fellow colleagues to cosponsor and help enact this legislation to rebuild a bipartisan consensus in foreign policy.●

By Mr. NUNN (for himself, Mr. ROBB, Mr. GLENN, Mr. BREAUX, and Mr. SASSER):

S. 3. A bill to establish a corporation to administer a program of voluntary national service, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

CITIZENSHIP AND NATIONAL SERVICE ACT

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I thank the Chair for recognition. I assure my colleagues. I know there are people waiting. I have to start a hearing in a few minutes on a confirmation. I will not take but just a moment.

But I want to take a moment on this beginning day to introduce with my colleagues who are on the floor, the Senator from Virginia, Senator ROBB, Senator GLENN, Senator BREAUX, and Senator SASSER, the Citizenship and National Service Act of 1989. Perhaps it should be called 1990 eventually because that is the effective date.

Mr. President, at the start of the 101st Congress, I am pleased to join with my distinguished colleague, Senator ROBB, in introducing the Citizenship and National Service Act of 1989.

This bill proposes an entirely new kind of public enterprise, one that enlists citizen volunteers to deliver vital human services for millions of needy Americans. Called the Citizens Corps, its basic aim is simple: to create new opportunities for American citizens, young and old, to serve each other and their country.

National service is not a new idea, but it is an idea whose time has come.

In fact, this legislation is essentially a new G.I. bill expanded to include civilian as well as military service to the Nation. It would be strictly voluntary but strongly encouraged by Federal benefits.

In brief, the Citizens Corps is intended to achieve three main purposes:

First, to awaken a new spirit of civic obligation and participation in America.

Second, to mobilize our Nation's youth to tackle pressing national needs, military and civilian. And,

Third, to promote upward mobility by expanding Federal support for higher education, job training and housing for those who volunteer to serve their country.

The Citizens Corps is based on a very simple but profound principle: that those who take from the common good should give something back. It rests on the premise that citizenship in a free society entails rights as well as responsibilities, and that a careful balance must be maintained between them if America's experiment in self-government is to endure.

Yet in recent decades, that balance seems to have become tilted in favor of ever-more expansive definitions of our rights as citizens. In Congress we often debate new entitlements; rarely do we speak of new civic duties. We believe the time has come to rectify that imbalance.

By linking public service and public benefits, voluntary national service can help us tackle two urgent problems facing our country: the "social deficit" of unmet human needs that has accumulated over the past decade, and the economic squeeze on low- and middle-income families.

With college and housing costs rising beyond the reach of many American families, and with career opportunities dwindling for high school graduates who lack more than rudimentary job skills, the need for a new program of strategic investment in our people is acute.

At bottom, what we are proposing is a new national commitment to developing the personal and economic potential of our Nation's youth. Such an investment, in my view, is critically important to our Nation's future as we compete in an increasingly sophisticated global marketplace.

Consequently, a central purpose of this bill is to strengthen Federal support for higher education. We believe strongly that as a matter of national policy, no young American should be denied the opportunity of a college or post-secondary education for lack of money.

Yet that is what is happening today. Existing Federal student aid programs by themselves are unequal to the task of ensuring equal opportunity in America. And too many young Americans are trapped in a demoralizing cycle of poverty and dependence; for them the prospect of college or even the chance for a decent job seems hopelessly remote.

We view the Citizens Corps as the means of fulfilling a national commitment to education and training for all young Americans who are willing to invest some "sweat equity" in their own future.

Under our proposal, Federal student aid entitlements would gradually be converted into benefits earned through service in the Citizens Corps. That, in our view, would put Federal support for post-secondary education on a firmer foundation of popular support. It would allow for the expansion in public support to education that is necessary to resolve the current student aid dilemma facing our country.

The following figures illustrate the dimensions of this dilemma:

*Between 1980 and 1988, costs for public and private colleges rose by about 40 percent after inflation, while family income grew by only 33 percent. During the same period, Federal student aid grew by just 3 percent after inflation.

*Federal grants have not kept pace with soaring education costs. In 1980, the maximum Pell grant covered over 40 percent of the average tuition bill, compared to only about 29 percent today.

*The emphasis of Federal aid has shifted from grants and work-study to guaranteed loans, which account for 66 percent of all aid today as opposed to 21 percent in 1976. Since 1980, student indebtedness has increased by 60 percent. Loan default rates have jumped from $200 million in 1981 to $1.4 billion last year. No wonder that Senator PELL, our leading authority on student aid, has warned that we are in danger of creating a new class of "indentured students."

*Most troubling of all is the drop in college enrollment among minorities and young people from low-income families. From 1980 to 1986, the proportion of students from blue collar families enrolling in college dropped by one-fifth. Black enrollment dropped from 34 percent in 1976 to 25 percent in 1985; Hispanic enrollment declined from 36 to 27 percent.

In short, Mr. President, the current Federal student aid programs are not working. Nor is it likely that in their present form they will be significantly improved and expanded given the fiscal constraints we face. We believe that the best way—and perhaps the only way—to muster support for such investments in the current fiscal climate is to link them to work that clearly serves broad national purposes.

The Citizens Corps will expand and effectively guarantee Federal education aid by offering all young Americans an equal opportunity to earn money for college or job training.

Existing Federal aid programs—Pell and supplemental equal opportunity grants, college work study, and guaranteed, Perkins and Plus loans—will not be ended, though participation rates and costs should decline. They will continue to be available to young people who cannot be assigned to tasks by the Citizens Corps, of for whom full-time service would pose an exceptional hardship.

Aside from those exceptions, we believe that any able-bodied youth who seeks the Government's help in financing education or training ought to be willing to give something back by way of national service. Thus, for most young people, the Citizens Corps would eventually supplant existing grant and loan programs as the primary route to college funding.

Furthermore, Mr. President, the Citizens Corps will correct a glaring inequity in the way we invest in our Nation's youth. While the Federal Government now spends over $8 billion annually to help college-bound people, it shows far less concern to the so-called forgotten half of our youth population that does not go on to college.

In an era of global competition, knowledge-intensive industry and rapidly changing technology, these young people especially will need access to advanced vocational and skills training. So both as a matter of social equity and enlightened self-interest, our Nation has a vital interest in making sure that non-college-bound youth also get a chance to share in the American dream.

Therefore, we've designed national service vouchers so that they can also be used to pay for vocational and job training, as well as for home ownership. Thus, the Citizens Corps can also help reverse the current decline in home ownership, which has been hitting young couples hardest.

The link between service and benefits would create a powerful magnet for broad participation in the Citizens Corps. It would make national service the principal route to college for all but the wealthiest in our society, so that borrowing would become a secondary and supplemental means of financing an education.

Linking student aid to national service has encountered two main objections, and I'd like to address them. First, some contend it would have a regressive effect, since the poor rely most on existing programs. However, vouchers would provide more aid, on average than grants. And let's not lose sight that the poor will be the primary beneficiaries of the services provided by hundreds of thousands of new volunteers.

This criticism also ignores the fact that college costs are squeezing many middle-income families, and that existing aid programs are regressive in the sense that they favor only the more fortunate youths who are college-bound.

Second, critics say that our proposal effectively exempts the rich, who can pay for college themselves, and in a strictly economic sense they are right. Only a compulsory national service program can ensure that everyone is treated exactly the same. However, experience with existing service programs like the Peace Corps shows that people from upper income families are disporportionately represented. And it may also be possible to build a presumption in favor of Citizens Corps graduates into college admissions and government hiring.

Mr. President, let me briefly describe how the Citizens Corps would work.

In return for 1 or 2 years' service at subsistence wages in either civilian or military service, young volunteers would earn national service vouchers worth substantial Federal aid for college, job training or housing.

Civilian service would target social needs that currently aren't being met by either government or the private sector: combatting illiteracy and serving as tutors and teachers' aides in public schools; working in hospitals, hospices, outpatient facilities, clinics and mental health centers; providing in-home care to the ill and elderly; expanding day care opportunities for working parents; repairing run-down housing; staffing shelters for the homeless; assisting in public safety and conservation, and more.

Youths who volunteer for military service would either serve 2 years on active duty or go directly into the Reserves. The goals of this "citizen soldier" option are to expand the military's recruitment and training base and bring about better social representation in our Armed Forces.

Although the chief focus would be on youth service, the Citizens Corps would also enlist a limited number of volunteers over 65 who could work either full- or part-time and would earn a modest hourly wage instead of vouchers. To help keep the program's overhead costs down, many retirees would be assigned to supervisory and administrative positions within the Citizens Corps itself.

I believe that national service can become an important component of a strong national defense. The bill is designed to strengthen recruitment by offering special enlistment options for people who do not plan to make a career in the military. These "citizen soldiers" would serve either in the Reserves or for 2 years in the Active Forces, receiving less pay than career soldiers but a higher post-service voucher. In this way, we would build up the Reserve and National Guard units in our country, broaden the mobilization base of our trained military manpower and, we hope, recruit from a broader cross-section of our Nations' youth. We just don't think it's right to ask only the children of poor and low-income families to defend our Nation.

Citizen soldiers can add an important new dimension to the All-Volunteer Force. Obviously, we will need the Department of Defense's support and expertise in refining enlistment options for citizen soldiers, and I look forward to working closely with all of the military services on this aspect of the bill.

This is the basic concept. It serves many different functions. The function of civic education and participation. The function of national defense. The function of helping our young people get a first-rate education or skills training. The function of helping young people realize the dream of home ownership. And it serves the crucial function of matching the youth and energy and enthusiasm and dedicated service of hundreds of thousands of America's young people to the many social needs of our country.

We know we have a grave problem when there are at least 17 million illiterate Americans. How are they going to fare in a changing labor market that puts a premium on mental agility? How are we going to provide quality child care when, by 1990, there will be 10 million children under 6 with working mothers in this country? And who is going to care for the growing number of Americans over 85—the so-called "old old?"

We believe national service can be part of the solution to these problems—not a panacea, but an innovative way to tackle public needs by expanding civic activism and participation instead of public bureaucracies.

To administer the Citizens Corps, we propose a new Corporation for National Service that would set broad policy and dispense Federal funds to States and localities on a 75–25 matching basis. The actual day to day activities of the Corps would be directed by local councils.

We envision the Citizens Corps as a decentralized and nonbureaucratic way to deliver human service to needy citizens. Rather than creating a vast new bureaucracy in Washington, our plan would strengthen civic and community resources—like charitable organizations, private, nonprofit groups, schools and churches, and local social service agencies—that are intermediate between the individual citizen and the Nation.

Mr. President, the program I have outlined is an ambitious one. It will not be cheap. Since we don't know how many people will volunteer, the costs are extremely difficult to forecast. Yet while we hope to phase national service in gradually, over a 5- to 10-year period, we should not minimize the costs of a full-blown program with perhaps over a million volunteers.

Yet neither should we underestimate the benefits of such a program. Like the GI bill, an investment in developing our people's potential will pay handsome dividends down the road. For example, the average college graduate can expect lifetime earnings about $640,000 greater than someone who didn't go to college and $460,000 more than someone who started college but did not finish.

And, by tackling human needs and social problems at their roots, we can save billions in remediation costs down the road. Better to invest now in dealing with illiteracy, undereducation and health problems than to spend immeasurably more later on welfare, unemployment, police and prisons.

In the light of our current fiscal plight, it is important that this legislation add nothing to the Federal deficit. Part of the costs of Federal service will be defrayed by reducing demand for existing forms of student aid. I would hope that the remaining costs can be covered by prudent restraint in other parts of the Federal budget. If not, then I will be willing to support the revenues necessary to get voluntary service started.

Mr. President, I view this legislation not as the last word but as the conceptual starting point for a thoroughgoing debate on the possibilities of voluntary national service. I am a realist and I know some aspects of this proposal will be controversial. But I urge my colleagues to take a close look at what we are trying to do with this bill. Even where we differ on the means, I believe we are likely to find broad agreement on the central goals of this legislation: delivering social services to needy Americans and expanding opportunities for the young people who serve.

Let me close by underscoring the importance of awakening the spirit of citizenship and civic obligation that has been slumbering in our Nation in recent years. That is the spirit that President John Kennedy invoked when he challenged Americans to "Ask not" what our country can do for for us, but what we can do for our country.

We've heard a lot about patriotism lately. We have heard it defined as waiving the flag and reciting the Pledge of Allegiance. But that definition leaves out the essential ingredient of true patriotism—sacrifice.

Without the willingness to sacrifice—to give something back to our country and our communities—patriotism is nothing more than an empty gesture.

So I think we ought to define patriotism not passively—in terms of rituals to be observed—but actively, in terms of civic duties to be performed.

We need to summon the spirit of civic enterprise and responsibility that built our Nation and made it great, and that is the key to renewing America's greatness today.

Mr. President, this is a basic concept. It served many different functions. The function of civic education and participation, the function of national defense, the function of helping our young people get a first-rate education or skilled training, investing in what we call human capital; the function of helping young people realize the dream of home ownership; and it serves the crucial function of matching the youth, energy, and enthusiasm and dedicated service of hundreds of thousands of America's young people to the many, many unmet social needs of our country.

I believe this legislation is not the last word as we introduce it today, and I ask my colleagues for their comments as we go along. This is the conceptual starting point for a thoroughgoing debate on the possibilities of voluntary national service.

We spent a lot of time debating entitlements, and have been for a long number of years. That debate will continue but I think we ought to add to that debate a debate on civic obligations.

So this is the legislation. We will have differing ideas about how it should be implemented. We are not trying to rush it through because it is a very significant departure from the way we both handle our education programs today, and also from the way we attempt to deliver social services.

But I urge all of my colleagues to take a look at the legislation. I would be delighted to discuss it with them. We have a number of people who have been working on it for a long time. It has been introduced on the House side also today.

I urge my colleagues' consideration.

I thank my colleagues for their patience and, Mr. President, I yield the floor. And I will be sending the bill to the desk, and asking it be given the appropriate number and referred to committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be received and appropriately referred.

● Mr. GLENN. I commend Senators NUNN and ROBB for their innovative approach in attempting to meet two very important national goals, fostering a new spirit of public service, both for service in the military and in the civilian community, and enhancing educational opportunities for our young people. As an original cosponsor of this bill, I believe that this legislation could rekindle a new attitude toward social responsibility—an attitude that was best seen during the years of President Kennedy—of young people eager to work for the good of their country in public service. At the same time, this bill can go a long way toward improving the educational and economic situation of young Americans.

So I am enthusiastic about what this bill could mean to the Nation. There are, however, a number of issues in the bill that need to be fully addressed in hearings, and on the Senate floor.

First, the gradual phase-out of Federal student grants and loans most certainly will concern many, myself among them. We need to ensure that any new system will work as well or better than the current system of grants and loans for both the middle class and for the economically disadvantaged who otherwise would be unable to achieve education or training beyond high school.

My second concern is that our colleges and universities not be put at a disadvantage by this bill. I know that educators across the country will have some very penetrating questions not only on the impact of this bill on the quality and quantity of education in this country, but also as to how the bill will affect their individual schools both programatically and economically.
